MKs rally for early elections bill

No-confidence motions defeated

By LIAT COLLINS

As the Knesset prepares to recess for three months tomorrow night, the opposition is preparing one last bid to pave the way for early elections.

The government survived another vote on three no-confidence motions yesterday. It has now beaten 60 no-confidence motions over the past two years.

The joint vote on the three motions by Labor, Meretz, and Hadash on the diplomatic process was 42 to 20 in favor. The two Moledet MKs abstained. The motions would have required the support of 61 MKs to pass.

Because it was clear yesterday that the motions could not pass, MKs paid less attention to that vote and put more emphasis on the two bills expected to be heard tomorrow calling for dissolving the Knesset and holding early elections. These bills, however, are also more a gesture than a realistic proposal and would mainly affect the government's prestige.

The bills – being raised at preliminary reading by Meretz whip Haim Oron and MK Haim Ramon (Labor) – need only a regular majority to pass at this stage, but would require 61 MKs to pass the next three readings. Coming the last day of the Knesset sitting, the bills will not be able to pass all the necessary readings until after the recess.

Yesterday's no-confidence motions were heard with little drama in a near-empty plenum.

MK Shimon Peres, presenting Labor's bill, said the differences with the Palestinians are "microscopic," but the decision on the redeployment is not being made because some MKs are threatening the government.

He accused the prime minister of causing "diplomatic paralysis, a defense crisis, and an economic recession."

Meretz leader Yossi Sarid said: "The entire coalition knows Binyamin Netanyahu is a false messiah."

Answering on behalf of the government, Science Minister Silvan Shalom said the government would prefer to carry out the redeployment with national support, but it cannot because the country is divided. Half the populace is calling on the government to make greater concessions, he said.

whereas Yasser Arafat is not being pressured to even keep existing agreements.

Moledet withdrew its own no-confidence motion earlier in the day after reaching an agreement with the prime minister's bureau chief, Uri Elitzur.

Pullback teams to talk today, Page 2

Under this agreement, the government promises to bring any redeployment agreement to the Knesset for approval, even during the recess.

It will then be possible to bring a no-confidence vote in the prime minister at the conclusion of the debate on the agreement. However, if the opposition does so, it could postpone a vote on the agreement until after the recess, since the opposition cannot force a no-confidence vote during a recess.

But the government, during a recess, can introduce bills and call for a vote of confidence. Therefore, if the Knesset approves the agreement during the recess, the government promised to introduce two bills, in two separate sessions, calling for votes of confidence on the agreement.

This, in theory, could expose it to being toppled, should the opposition and small parties – say, the NRP or Moledet, who might disapprove of the redeployment agreement – vote against the government.

Although the National Religious Party decided to oppose the no-confidence motions yesterday, its MKs are divided on how to act tomorrow during the vote on the dissolution bills.

NRP whip Shmuryahu Ben-Tsur said, "Things could change at any moment."

MK Hanan Porat (NRP) announced he will support the dissolution bills. "In my opinion, it is in the best interests of the state – as well as the prime minister's interests – that elections be held before May 1999."

That will be a critical time. Arafat is likely to declare a Palestinian state and the final status agreements will still be ahead. The prime minister must stop these redeployments. Before May 1999, he should hold new elections, and the public will decide," he said.

Gesher MKs absented themselves from yesterday's vote, but party leader David Levy said they will support the dissolution bills.

Levy cited the country's economic problems and said: "When the government is not functioning and the Knesset is helpless, the Knesset should be dissolved."

Some Yisrael Ba'aliya MKs voted against the no-confidence motions yesterday and the party is expected to vote against dissolving the Knesset.

The head of the Land of Israel Front, Michael Kleiner (Gesher), said that yesterday four members of the front said they would support the dissolution motions: Kleiner, Porat, Yurit Stern (Yisrael Ba'aliya), and Benny Elon (Moledet).

Third Way MKs also did not participate in the no-confidence motions, saying in a statement that "The faction is dissatisfied with the way the prime minister is acting to promote the peace process."

Earlier, Third Way MKs had reacted differently to the reports that Netanyahu had suggested that part of the Judean Desert be handed to the Palestinians as a nature reserve as part of the second redeployment agreement.

The Third Way platform states that it will not agree to conceding territory in Jerusalem, the Golan Heights, the Judean Desert, or the Jordan Valley.

Third Way whip Yehuda Harel said yesterday: "From our point of view, the Judean Desert is like the Golan Heights. We're not talking about the interests of the coalition, but about what is important for the country and what the country's borders are."

MK Alex Lubotzky also adamantly opposed the proposal. "I am not prepared to talk about this other than to say it will be something we'll regret forever. It will be a huge mistake and I hope it won't happen," he said.

MK Emanuel Zissmann was less decisive, saying, "We're in a difficult situation. In my opinion, because of the missed opportunities on the interim agreement over the last year, the most important thing now is that the prime minister keeps his commitment to abide by the agreements and carry out redeployment."

May unemployment hits 9.3%

By DAVID HARRIS

Unemployment rose to 9.3 percent in May, its highest level since the third quarter of 1993, according to initial figures the Central Bureau of Statistics published yesterday.

In real terms, some 210,000 people were out of work in May. The bureau also updated its figures for April, showing that unemployment then passed the 200,000 mark for the first time since early 1993, as joblessness reached 9.1% rather than 8.8% as published a month ago.

The May percentage, which is a seasonally-adjusted figure, could prove not to be the final figure for the month as the bureau continues to process data.

The monthly numbers are trend figures, while the bureau believes the most reliable statistic to be its quarterly jobless total, which for the first quarter stood at 8.4%. The numbers for the second three months of the year will be published at the end of August, said bureau spokesman David Neumann.

The monthly unemployment total has risen steadily from 8.6% in February through 8.8% in March and 9.1% in April.

In their ongoing dialogue ahead of publication of the 1999 state budget proposals, Treasury and Bank of Israel economists are assuming that unemployment will average 9% this year. Before yesterday's announcement, they were assuming joblessness would hit 9.4-9.6% by the year's end.

Under a barrage of criticism over the government's macroeconomic policies, Finance Minister Yaakov Neuman yesterday pledged that "unemployment is at the top of the Treasury's list of priorities in constructing economic policy for 1999."

He failed to give examples, however, of programs aimed at reducing unemployment.

"The government is continuing in its path of destruction of the economy," charged Labor's chief economics spokesman Avraham Shohat. "All the speeches of the prime minister and finance minister about renewed [economic]

Report: Israelis involved in Burma arms production

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN and news agencies

Israeli consultants are helping Myanmar, formerly Burma, produce small arms and ordinance in a prefabricated factory built in Singapore, the London-based Jane's Defense Weekly said yesterday.

The report comes amid renewed denunciations of the military-ruled government of Myanmar for the arrest of Nobel Peace Prize winner Suu Kyi, head of the National League for Democracy.

According to the latest issue of Jane's, the Israelis are connected with TAAS-Israel Industries, but it is unclear whether they are current or former employees.

The factory was designed and built by Chartered Industries of Singapore and shipped to Yangon, formerly Rangoon, in mid-February. The factory is most likely producing the EMERK-1, a local assault rifle, the weekly said.

"They rebuilt the whole factory in Burma with assistance from Israeli military experts. We still don't know exactly whether these experts are active officers of the Israeli military or former officers," said a journalist from Radio-Free Burma interviewed on Israel Radio yesterday.

The Defense Ministry in Tel Aviv issued a reaction to the report which was neither a confirmation nor a denial.

"The Defense Ministry has a clear policy anchored in the practices of the office which determines the security links and their scope and character. It is a policy which is in line with the foreign policy of Israel and coordinated with the Foreign Ministry," the statement said.

"We do not elaborate on this policy regarding each specific nation," the statement added.

A TAAS spokesman said he was looking into the report and could not comment otherwise about it.

In the sharp condemnation yet by the United States of the government of Myanmar, US Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said that Washington "deplores the government of Burma's refusal to allow members of the National League for Democracy, a legal political party, to travel freely."

Electoral red light

By AMITZ AN-EL

cern focused not on the national debt, current-account deficit, trade balance or even cost of living and interest rates, but on jobs.

The mid-1960s recession was never actually brought to the voters because the Six Day War suddenly erupted, inadvertently generating new investments, growth and jobs.

This decade, however, the rise of unemployment to nearly 11 percent in 1992 clearly played a role in the downfall of Yitzhak Shamir's government.

Now, considering that this two-year-old government already has seen the jobless rate soar from just above 6% to well over 9%, it takes no Arthur Finkelshteyn to understand that Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu faces a serious electoral threat that has nothing to do with the peace process, to which he dedicates the bulk of his time.

The situation is particularly alarming from Netanyahu's viewpoint since – unlike the 1992 labor crisis, which affected mainly new immigrants from the former Soviet Union – today's unemployed often come from traditional Likud constituencies of unskilled laborers in peripheral settlements.

Faced with this predicament, politicians are prone to seek monetary and fiscal expansion, which means lowering interest rates and increasing public spending.

But interest rates have been lower for more than half a year, and our public spending, at slightly more than half of gross domestic product, is already among the developed world's highest.

Neeman's health plan would break his own law

By JUDY SIEGEL

Finance Minister Yaakov Neuman's "new, improved plan" for directly charging residents for health services – by instituting a monthly health fund fee determined by income level – would apparently violate the Arrangements Law which he personally pushed through the Knesset in December.

Neuman, in an emergency meeting Sunday with Health Minister Yehoshua Matza, suggested the progressive charge in desperation after Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu ordered the withdrawal from the Knesset Finance Committee of the previous proposal – a monthly head tax of NIS 20 per person and up to NIS 55 per family, to be paid by all residents to their health funds.

The proposal, which also included user's fees for visiting community health fund clinic doctors and hospital outpatient clinics, aroused much ire in the coalition – especially Shas – and the opposition. Netanyahu saw it had no chance of passing the finance committee and told the ministries to find another way to collect NIS 350 million from the public to help ease the health system's NIS 1.5 billion deficit.

After health fund and hospital directors held a press conference announcing imminent closing of facilities and their financial collapse, Neuman set up a meeting with Matza. According to a Health Ministry press release, Neuman – a prominent lawyer – suggested the option of a monthly fee levied according to income and asked for a week's timeout, during which he would try to get the coalition to back the idea.

The Finance Ministry spokesman issued a press release with no details of Neuman's proposals, and refused to comment yesterday when The Jerusalem Post pointed out to him that the plan would be illegal.

According to Section 8, Paragraph B of the Arrangements Bill, "payments by [health fund] members – whether as co-payments or a periodic, regular payment, will be uniform and not discriminate [among people], and without being tied to members' income." Thus Neuman's "new, improved" scheme would violate the law authored by the Treasury itself, and implementing it would require the Arrangements Law to be amended – likely to be a very complex process, given the fact that its passage was extremely difficult.

Officials in both ministries are reportedly at their wits' end to find a solution to the deficit problem. Many legal experts say the requirement to pay for visits to the doctor cannot be enforced, since the National Health Insurance Law bars denying medical care to people who refuse to pay for it.

Matza has advocated raising the income ceiling for health taxes deducted monthly by the National Insurance Institute from four times the average wage to six times that figure, but the Treasury and the NII strongly oppose this idea, each for its own reasons. The Treasury doesn't want to increase taxes, while the NII argues that the four-times-income ceiling is the standard one for other payments as well.

Tomorrow health system personnel are to demonstrate opposite the Knesset at 1 p.m. to protest against the system's severe financial straits. They will warn that without a massive injection of funds, the insurers will have to close down their facilities, risking the collapse of public hospitals as well. The Treasury had promised the health funds NIS 300 million when they began to collect additional user's and membership fees directly from the public; but now, this has been held up.

Lewinsky meets with US prosecutors

WASHINGTON (AP) — Former White House intern Monica Lewinsky met yesterday with prosecutors investigating an alleged presidential affair and cover-up, sources familiar with the US probe said. The meeting took several hours.

Meanwhile, in a victory for independent counsel Kenneth Starr, a federal appeals court yesterday ordered US presidential aide Bruce Lindsey to submit to grand jury questioning in the Lewinsky investigation.

Starr is seeking to get Lindsey, who is employed by the federal government, to testify about private discussions he had with Clinton regarding the Lewinsky case.

PM cancels attendance at Histadrut convention

The Prime Minister's Office announced last night that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu would not attend a Histadrut convention in Jerusalem today.

It denied that the reason for the cancellation was a reported dispute about whether Netanyahu or President Ezer Weizman would deliver the opening address.

"There is no problem between the Prime Minister's Office and the President's bureau," it said. "Netanyahu will not arrive at the convention because of his tight schedule." Jerusalem Post Staff

Bentsur seeks to calm Arab anger over J'lem

Foreign Ministry Director-General Eytan Bentsur said yesterday that he saw no reason why tomorrow's convocation of the 16-member Jerusalem Committee in Morocco should produce anti-Israel resolutions in reprisal for the proposed expansion of the municipality's administrative control. "We hope the participants will opt for realism," Bentsur said, and urged them to "accept the mayor of Jerusalem's explanations that creation of an umbrella municipality was merely a municipal issue." He also called on them to take note of the religious freedom and the development under way "in all parts of the city for the benefit of all its inhabitants, Arab as well as Jewish." Jay Bushinsky

Mordechai: US to blame for Iran missile efforts

Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said in an interview to be published today that he holds the United States and the West responsible for Iran's successful ballistic missile endeavor.

"The United States first and foremost and all the nations of Europe won't be absolved from responsibility if the Iranians succeed in developing non-conventional weapons and long-range, surface-to-surface missiles," Mordechai was quoted as telling the French magazine Politique Internationale.

Mordechai also said that Russia was capable of halting aid given by Russian firms to Iran. Arieh O'Sullivan

Ziv Chen questioned under caution

Ziv Chen, the ex-boyfriend of convicted traitor Nahum Manbar's former lawyer Pinat Yanai, was questioned under caution yesterday, indicating he may be charged with a crime.

Police sources said Chen, who was questioned for more than 13 hours Sunday, was interrogated for more than 10 hours yesterday concerning his High Court affidavit alleging impropriety between Yanai and Tel Aviv District Court Judge Amnon Straschnov, who sentenced Manbar this month to 16 years in prison for selling poison gas material to Iran. Police finished questioning Manbar's wife, Francine, yesterday. Gil Hoffman

Officials say King Hussein had chemotherapy

Jordan's King Hussein has undergone chemotherapy treatment at an American hospital following reports he may have lymphatic cancer, Jordanian officials said yesterday. The king's brother, Crown Prince Hassan, said the monarch may soon leave the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minnesota, after initial treatment but would remain in the Midwestern state for a "period of rest."

"We hope to hear the good results of the first stage of treatment in the coming two days, and the king will possibly leave hospital in the coming few days," Hassan told Jordanian soldiers Sunday. His remarks were published by Amman dailies yesterday. The king is expected to deliver a message to the Jordanian people today about his diagnosis and the results of treatment. AP

Entebbi resigns as MDA head

Prof. Shlomi Entebbi, president of Magen David Adom, "jointly decided" with Health Minister Yehoshua Matza yesterday that he would resign after less than two years in the post. Entebbi, 58 and married, was sentenced to perform 150 days of community service after confessing to performing an indecent act on his secretary when he was Kupat Holim Clalit's district physician in Tel Aviv. According to evidence presented in the Tel Aviv District Court, which agreed to a plea bargain, Entebbi reached under her clothes and touched her breasts against the secretary's will. According to a Health Ministry announcement, Matza and Entebbi "reached an agreement" that the MDA president would leave his post and that the minister will look for a replacement. Judy Siegel

Palestinian's organs save four Israelis

A Palestinian family said yesterday that it had donated four organs from its son's body to Israeli Jews in a gesture they said defied often tense relations between Israelis and Palestinians. "We thought of the donation as a purely humanitarian issue, no matter what were the patients' nationalities, they were human beings," said Abdel-Halim Bawadi, brother of Farid Bawadi who was killed in a car accident on Thursday. His family agreed to donate several organs from his body after 35-year-old Bawadi, from the Bureij refugee camp in Gaza, was declared brain dead. Surgeons transplanted two kidneys, the liver and the heart into four patients. Reuters

Pullback talks to resume today

By JAY BUSHINSKY, MOHAMMED NAJIB and news agencies

Israeli and Palestinian negotiating teams are expected to resume negotiations today over the next IDF pullback, although talks between Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and deputy Palestinian Authority chairman Mahmoud Abbas appear to be on hold pending PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's return from abroad.

A main issue of today's talks is expected to be Israel's proposal to turn 3 percent of a proposed 13% stretch of land to be given to the Palestinians into a nature reserve under joint Israeli-Palestinian security control. The suggested park would be in an uninhabited swath of the Judean Desert.

The Israeli negotiating team is headed by Cabinet Secretary Dan Naveh and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's legal adviser, Yitzhak Molcho, while the Palestinian team leaders are Saeb Erekat, the chief negotiator, and security chief Mohammad Dahlan.

Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani said after meeting Abbas at a Jerusalem hotel yesterday that they had agreed to renew committee talks on safe passage for Palestinians between the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"We hope to complete the work that was begun beforehand, but interrupted and halted," Kahalani said.

He also demanded the extradition of Palestinian murder suspects and asked Abbas for help in learning the fate of three soldiers missing in action since the Sultan

Other topics discussed included the opening of an airport and seaport in Gaza.

The Palestinians demanded the release of prisoners including some under administrative detention and the creation of a joint Miguel Moratinos, the European Union's envoy to the Middle East, said yesterday in Damascus that the French-Egyptian idea of an international conference to revive the peace process is "taking shape."

He added that the idea still had

Moratinos leaves today for Lebanon and is expected to return to Israel later in the week.

In Austria yesterday, Arafat asked the EU to increase pressure

Rubinstein demands court prevent terrorist's release

By DAN IZENBERG

Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein yesterday submitted an urgent petition to the High Court of Justice asking it to issue a temporary injunction to prevent the Prisons Service from releasing convicted terrorist Ziyad Musa Zayyad from jail tomorrow.

The Prisons Service Parole Board decided last week to deduct one-third of Zayyad's sentence on the grounds that an accomplice had been released after completing two-thirds of his jail term.

Zayyad was sentenced to 12 years in prison in 1990 after being convicted of killing a suspected collaborator and belonging to the illegal Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

Rubinstein accused the parole board of ignoring a High Court ruling to withdraw an earlier decision to release Zayyad. The court had instructed the parole board to study a secret report by the General Security Service before making up its mind. According to Rubinstein, the board had refused to read the report before making its first decision, on June 3, to release Zayyad.

On July 20, the board met again. Its members said they had already read the secret report, and refused to hear behind-closed-doors testimony from GSS agents.

Zayyad, who was represented by attorney Avigdor Feldman, argued that other members of the PFLP, including Munir Abu Diab, who was convicted of the same crimes as Zayyad, had been given early releases.

But the state argued that Zayyad's case could not be compared to that of Diab.

He had already been jailed for terrorist crimes and committed the new ones just a few months after being released from his first prison term.

During his second term, he had participated in three riots. In addition, there was the secret GSS information. All that adds up to the fact that "there is a heavy suspicion that Zayyad will continue with his violent activities as a member of the PFLP as soon as he is released from prison," the state argued.

Thousands attend rally on 'evil speech'

By HAIM SHAPIRO

By going to a conference on "guarding the tongue," Linda Kelleman said yesterday that she hopes to make the world just a little bit better.

Kelleman was one of some 10,000 women planning to attend last night's conference at the Jerusalem International Convention Center (Binyanei Ha'uma), to hear exhortations against lashon hora ("evil speech").

However, as she pointed out, the laws concerning lashon hora include but go beyond forbidding saying bad things to people, slandering people, or gossiping.

The project bringing women together during the nine days before Tisha Be'av to study the laws of lashon hora began 14 years ago in one of the haredi neighborhoods of Jerusalem.

This week there were about 200 study groups meeting in synagogues and schools before coming together for the central gathering at the JICC. The classes were in Hebrew, English, French and Yiddish.

Last night's gathering featured Hebrew-speaking lecturers; a similar rally in English is to take place tomorrow night at the same venue.

In addition to the Jerusalem gatherings, there are similar events in Haifa, Beit Shemesh and Kiryat Sefer, as well as in the US, Canada and South Africa.

Perhaps the most extraordinary thing about the project is that it tries to cut across the religious community's political and organizational lines.

"We don't represent any party or group," said an organizer, who asked that she not be named.

At a class at Beit Knesset Hanassi on Jerusalem's Rehov Ussishkin yesterday afternoon, over 100 women representing a cross-section of the Orthodox English-speaking public listened as Rabbi David Orlofsky spoke to them, interspersing his moral message with stories and anecdotes.

Labor backs Shetreet

By AMY KLEIN

The Labor Party will not run with the Likud under Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert in the upcoming municipal elections, and will continue to support Shimon Shetreet's candidacy for mayor, the party decided last night.

A special Labor panel dealing with the Jerusalem elections met at the Knesset last night to review the party's decision to back Shetreet and his One Jerusalem list. Recently, MK Shimon Peres and Jewish Agency chairman Avraham Burg had called for withdrawing support from Shetreet and running with Olmert on a joint list.

Shetreet had filed an official complaint with the Labor Party on Sunday to demand an end to the talks with Olmert.

The decision to support Shetreet came in a vote by MKs and other party activists attending the meeting, including Ehud Barak, Avraham Shohat, Avraham Burg, Ra'anan Cohen, Micha Goldmann, Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, Haim Cohen, Dalia Itzik and Tzaly Reshef. Burg, Ben-Eliezer and Shohat opposed the decision.

Shetreet was not invited to the meeting, but was informed of the outcome shortly after.

Evidently a serious treatment of the labor crisis only can come in the form of sharply reduced public spending. This would allow for a genuine tax cut, which in turn would accelerate non-state-sponsored economic activity, or sustainable growth.

Yet trimming government activity only can be achieved by biting deep into an assortment of small parties' vested interests, from yeshiva funding to new-immigrants' mortgages.

It follows that the only way to effectively defeat unemployment is to establish a Likud-Labor government that would not be held hostage by small-interest groups, just like the unity government which beat hyperinflation in 1985.

Shoval supports low-key US role in peace talks

By HILLEL KUTLER

WASHINGTON — Too intensive an American role in the peace process is not healthy for US-Israeli relations, Israeli ambassador to Washington Zalman Shoval said yesterday.

In his first speech since taking over the post two weeks ago, Shoval told the Washington Institute for Near East Policy that while the current American role as a facilitator in the talks was appropriate, if Washington were to assume the role of a judge, it would be "not helpful" and "could create bilateral disagreements in the future between us and the US."

"I would like to see a more intensive role between the parties themselves, and less with the US," Shoval said.

Before final status negotiations, Jerusalem must convey to Washington what its red lines "are, will be, and won't be negotiable," he added. "We will have to see to it that there's a better understanding of... where we can't go."

Shoval added that while relations between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and US President Bill Clinton may be strained, "as important as that may be, the closeness of the [bilateral] relationship is unharmed and I believe will continue to grow."

He said he expects the US to stick to Clinton's policy of leaving security decisions to Israel and that "we will be able to overcome the temporary difficulties in the relationship."

Shoval said that the gap between Israel and the Palestinians is "as narrow as can be" and could be bridged "within a few days, if not a few hours."

Shoval also criticized last week's passage of a treaty establishing an international criminal court that included an item, sponsored by Egypt and Syria, classifying as a war crime the transfer of populations to occupied territories.

"I have an urge, when I get back to Israel, to buy a house in the territories," he said. "Let them declare me a war criminal."

Soldiers complaining less - IDF

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN

Contrary to popular opinion, soldiers are complaining less than in the past and the biggest drop in complaints last year came from reservists serving in combat units, according to Col. Ahuva Yanai, the outgoing IDF public complaints officer.

Yanai cited the intensive efforts to ease and shorten reserve duty during the past two years as the reason reservists are complaining less. Presenting the statistics for 1997 at a Tel Aviv press conference yesterday, Yanai said 7,307 complaints were received by her office last year, representing a 7.6 percent drop from the previous year.

Half the complaints reaching her office come from men and women doing compulsory service. She said her office is making an extra effort to reach out to minority and immigrant troops, with four Russian-speaking complaint officers and one Amharic-speaking officer.

Most of the complaints from conscripts revolve around unit assignments, money, and service conditions. Soldiers also complain about unfair treatment by their commanders, who are often accused of ignoring medical instructions.

One case she cited involved a soldier who was forced to open an IDF stretcher by banging it with his head. The soldier was injured, his medical profile lowered as a result, and he was disqualified from combat duty. "This is no doubt lifelong damage," Yanai said.

In this decade, the army has seen a rise in the number of complaints filed by parents and relatives of soldiers. Today some 20 percent of all complaints are made by parents, the most common being the lack of sleep their children are getting and collective punishments. Another popular complaint expresses dissatisfaction with the unit to which their child is assigned.

One of the most difficult complaints came from a mother who had two sons serving in Lebanon at the same time and wanted that stopped. Yanai said that careful examination of military regulations did not find any that forbid two brothers serving on the battlefield. The matter was even more complicated by the fact that the mother had filed the complaint without her sons' knowledge. With a heavy heart, Yanai found the complaint unjustified.

Yanai, whose husband is OC Planning Branch Maj.-Gen. Shlomo Yanai, is retiring from service and is being replaced by Lt. Col. Devora Hasi.

Wallerstein dismisses report on Arutz 7 indictment

By GIL HOFFMAN

Binyamin Regional Council head Pinhas Wallerstein said yesterday he has not heard from the State Attorney's Office on whether charges will be filed against him or from police about whether their investigation of Arutz 7 has been completed.

Wallerstein dismissed a report in Yedioth Aharonot that police have completed the investigation and will recommend that he be indicted along with some 30 Arutz 7 staffers, calling it "speculation."

"If there will be an indictment by the state attorney, then I will give my opinion," Wallerstein told Israel Radio. According to the report, Wallerstein would be charged with permitting the station to operate from territory within his jurisdiction.

The Arutz 7 employees against whom police want to file charges include station manager Ya'acov Katz, technical manager Yoel Tsar, news editor Hagai Segal, broadcaster Adir Zik and Beit El Yeshiva head Rabbi Zalman Melamed, a member of the station's board of directors.

Reacting to the list, Yehudit Tayar, spokeswoman for the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, said, "It would be an interesting scenario if they decide to indict the staff of Arutz 7. In the event of an indictment, we feel that all the dignitaries who have appeared on the station, including Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu, should also be investigated for cooperating with 'illegal' radio broadcasts."

The police investigation into whether Arutz 7 is operating illegally began two months ago, with a raid of the station's recording studio in Beit El, and its transmitters in Har Bracha and Psagot.

Police have questioned the station's managers, directors, broadcasting personnel, technicians and advertising staff.

Since the beginning of the investigation, all the suspects have exercised their right to remain silent during questioning, according to national police spokesman Elihu Ben-On.

Arutz 7 has suspended its broadcasts for the nine-day mourning period preceding Tisha Be'av.

Jet trainer crashes

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN

An IAF A-4 Skyhawk jet crashed in the Judean foothills yesterday during a routine training flight, but both aviators - an instructor and pilot cadet - ejected and landed safely, the IDF Spokesman said.

The IDF said a technical malfunction caused the crash, but OC Air Force Maj.-Gen. Eitan Ben-Eliahu has appointed a board of inquiry to examine the accident.

This was the fourth aircraft crash so far this year and the second training mishap in less than a week. Last Tuesday, a low-flying F-15 cut the power to Eilat briefly when it struck a high-tension wire and brought down an electricity pylon in the Negev.

Yesterday's TA-4H Skyhawk crash occurred around 3:20 p.m. just north of the Tarkumiya crossing on the road to Hebron. The crash site was about 11 km east of Beit Guvrin, just beyond the Green Line in what the IDF said was Area C.

"I saw two parachutists coming down and a few seconds later there was a loud explosion," said Ziad Abu Haltam, who was driving on the road to his home in Tarkumiya.

The Skyhawk was heading south with two other A-4s, he said, when it narrowly missed the village by some 350 meters and plowed into a cut wheat field, setting it alight as the single jet engine exploded. Pieces of the trainer were scattered for hundreds of meters. IAF officers said the jet was not armed.

"I ran up to the pilots and told them, 'Don't be scared. I am here to help you,'" said Abu Haltam. "They were confused and I gave them my mobile phone to call, but the pilot told me he couldn't remember any numbers. I saw a piece of radio equipment on the ground and gave it to them and told them to call for help, which they did."

"I undid their belts. I cleaned the blood off their faces. But they weren't hurt very badly. They were just kids," he said.

With hundreds of villagers looking on, IDF officers combed the field and olive groves for clues to the crash. Video tape carried in the jet was collected in a plastic bag.

"As a Palestinian and a human being I wanted to help them. Even though the next day they could be bombing our refugee camps in Lebanon. I hope that they think back on the day a Palestinian cared for them and maybe they'll think twice about bombing," Abu Haltam said, adding he hopes to meet the pilots someday - "only next time they drop in, they should come in a car."

The US-made Skyhawks arrived here in December 1967 and 52 were shot down in the Yom Kippur War. Today there is just one squadron still in active service and they are used in advance training for fighter pilots and navigators.

Aviv Bushinsky leading candidate to replace Bazak

By MICHAEL YUDELMAN

Aviv Bushinsky, Army Radio's diplomatic reporter, is the leading candidate to replace Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu's spokesman, Shai Bazak, who is reportedly leaving his post.

Other candidates for the job include Channel 1's Gil Tamari, the education minister's spokesman, Yitzhak Rati, and Ramat Gan spokesman Menni Peres.

Bazak was implicated in the Strashtnov Affair, when it was alleged he had told attorney Pinat Yanai, who was then on the team defending convicted traitor Nahum Manbar, that if Manbar were convicted, Netanyahu would accuse former prime ministers Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Rabin of trying to cover up his crimes.

Yanai told this to Manbar's wife Francine, who recorded the conversation.

Both Bazak and Yanai denied they had discussed the issue, and Yanai said she had lied to Francine Manbar when she told her this.

But it was hard to explain how Yanai had so accurately predicted the allegation against Rabin and Peres - which Netanyahu was later quoted as making - and suspicion fell on Bazak.

Bazak earlier this week denied he is leaving his position and stressed he has the prime minister's full support.

But Netanyahu is reportedly considering him for an attractive diplomatic appointment abroad, as compensation for having to leave his post.

Bazak was unavailable for comment yesterday. Army Radio asked Bushinsky to go on leave this week, following weekend reports that he was negotiating for the post of Netanyahu's spokesman.

Bushinsky, who previously served as Israel Radio police reporter, was briefly the center of controversy when his coverage of the Bar-On Affair investigation angered many of his colleagues in the Israel Broadcasting Authority.

ISA sources complained Bushinsky's reports were biased in favor of Netanyahu and others involved in the affair, whom the police had recommended indicting.

Eitan: Ministries not ready for 2000 bug

By JUDY SIEGEL

The majority of government ministries have failed to prepare for the "2000 bug" that threatens to affect computer operations around the world starting January 1, 2000, deputy minister in the Prime Minister's Office Michael Eitan said yesterday.

Speaking to the Knesset Science and Technology Committee, whose subcommittee has held five meetings about the problem, the former science minister said the ministries were guilty of failing to implement a government decision taken in June 1996 to head off complications from the problem. The computer problems will result from programs using two digits for dates in the 21st century, rather than four digits for those in the 21st.

Minister Alex Lubozky (The Third Way), who heads the subcommittee, called on the prime minister to name an authoritative person to ensure that state offices prepare themselves for the millennium. He noted that not only will six million Israelis be here on New Year's Eve 2000, but a million Christians also will be on hand to mark the 2,000th anniversary (more or less) of the birth of Jesus.

Fresh news from Tnuva Milk:
Now you can drink milk and enjoy, as well as the great taste, the health benefits of LGG - the world's leading "friendly" bacteria.

Every child knows that milk is good for you, and supplies you with calcium, protein and other important nutrients. Now there's a milk that's twice as healthy! Tnuva LGG Milk drink has three important benefits: it improves digestion, it restores the body's equilibrium, and it strengthens the body's natural defense system.

What's happening to our bodies?
Everyday, almost without noticing, our health suffers. We breathe unclean air, eat unhealthy food, and work in stressful surroundings. These conditions directly affect the body: the natural bacteria is weakened, and we are more vulnerable to harmful bacteria which causes illness.

LGG1 - how does it work?
A new scientific approach to health called probiotics (pro-for, biotics=life) has recently been developed. The aim is simple: to strengthen the body's friendly bacteria, which is why it's been chosen to enrich Tnuva's milk products.

Who needs LGG1?
Tnuva LGG1 Milk drink is suitable for everyone - babies, children and adults, including pregnant women and nursing mothers. One glass of Tnuva LGG1 Milk drink gives you all the Probiotic health benefits - all day long.

Court to rule on Deri's immunity

By DAN IZENBERG

The High Court of Justice is expected today to hand down a ruling on petitions contesting the Knesset House Committee's decision to postpone a vote on Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein's request to lift Shas MK Aryeh Deri's parliamentary immunity so he can be indicted on charges of fraud and breach of trust.

The petition has been billed as a test of the balance of power between the Knesset and the High Court, since justices are being asked to overrule a Knesset proceeding.

Amitai, one of the two petitioners, is asking the court to nullify the committee's decision. The other petitioner, the Movement for Quality Government, said in a hearing on July 20 that it would be satisfied if the court ruled that Deri could not be prevented from being prosecuted if the statute of limitations went into effect because of the postponement.

During that hearing, Supreme Court President Aharon Barak pointedly asked both petitioners if a ruling on the statute of limitations would satisfy them. He reiterated the court's long-standing reluctance to interfere in Knesset proceedings.

The statute of limitations is due to go into effect on August 1, five years after the end of an investigation into the allegations against Deri — unless the court rules that the countdown was suspended as soon as the Knesset received the attorney-general's request to lift the SHAS MK's immunity.

The court has never ruled on this matter before. When they voted in favor of the postponement on June 23, members of the House Committee said they assumed the countdown had been suspended once Knesset proceedings began.

Deri is accused of fraud and breach of trust by a public servant for allegedly forcing local authorities to channel government money to haredi institutions while serving as Interior Minister and director-general of the ministry. Many beneficiaries of Deri's system were close to Deri personally, or to Shas.

Rubinstein has refused to defend the committee to the High Court because he believed it had been wrong to postpone the vote on his request.

Knesset legal adviser Zvi Inbar has told the court that if it ruled that the countdown for the statute of limitations had not been suspended, the committee would immediately hold a vote on Rubinstein's request.

Nimrodi petitions High Court: 'Yediot's' Mozes must stand trial

By DAN IZENBERG

Ma'ariv publisher Ofer Nimrodi petitioned the High Court of Justice yesterday, calling on it to nullify the decision of the State Attorney's Office not to prosecute Arnon Mozes, the chief editor and chairman of the board of directors of Yediot Aharanot.

Acting Justice Hanoah Ariel ordered the sides to prepare their responses and decided that the petition would be heard by a panel of three justices. No date has yet been set for the hearing.

Nimrodi, represented by attorney Dan Avi-Yitzhak, demanded that Mozes and Haim Rosenberg, who is in charge of security at Yediot, be tried for a host of charges beginning with wiretapping.

Nimrodi and his security chief, David Ronen, were convicted of wiretapping last month. Nimrodi was sentenced to eight months in jail.

The former editor and news editor of Yediot Aharanot were also convicted of wiretapping.

In the petition, Nimrodi charged that he had been discriminated against and received radically different treatment from Mozes because of Mozes's commanding position as editor of the country's largest newspaper, the newspaper's other media interests, and Mozes's wealth.

"Mozes is one of a handful of men who have the greatest possible influence both among the public at large and the various government authorities," said Nimrodi. "He also wields great economic power."

On April 27, 1998, the Justice Ministry announced that it had decided not to press charges against Mozes and Rosenberg. Nimrodi said the decision and the reasons given for it were "astonishing and raised questions."

Nimrodi included affidavits from a number of retired police officers, including former deputy commander Zlani Sasson, who was involved in the investigation of Mozes and Rosenberg.

"I was absolutely amazed when I learned from the media that the State Attorney's Office had decided to close the file and not press charges against them," he wrote. "The decision and the reasons given for it totally contradicted the facts as they were uncovered and verified during the investigation."

Nimrodi singled out Tel Aviv District Attorney (Criminal Division) Miriam Rosenthal and indicated that she had close ties to the top echelon at Yediot Aharanot.

He wrote that she had disqualified herself from involvement in another investigation involving Mozes and Yediot investigative reporter Mordechai Gilat because Gilat was a close personal friend. This time she did not disqualify herself.

"[Rosenthal] initiated the astonishing decision [not to press charges] and was the living spirit behind it," wrote Nimrodi.

He also accused State Attorney Edna Arbel of refusing to accept the testimony of private investigator Ze'ev Laufer, who allegedly provided incriminating information against Mozes and Rosenberg.

Arbel prevented him from turning state's witness because he had received money from Ma'ariv in return for waiving his right to remain silent.

Former attorney-general Michael Ben-Yair and other senior justice and police officials had earlier agreed to Laufer's testimony even though they knew he had received money from Ma'ariv, said Nimrodi.

Ministry aims to stop doctors from taking commercial junkets

By JUDY SIEGEL

The Health Ministry is in the process of amending regulations that will prevent doctors in the public hospitals from going on holidays paid for by commercial firms to promote the use of their products.

Rules were issued by the ministry in 1993, according to director-general Prof. Gabi Barabash, but there were loopholes that have to be closed.

Two hundred physicians who were supposed to fly to Turkey yesterday for a four-day "symposium" at the expense of the Teva pharmaceutical company had to unpack their bags at the last moment — by order of Health Minister Yehoshua Matza.

He canceled the trip, arguing that it was meant to promote sales of a new drug, Cardura-XL, that Teva markets.

In a letter to Teva, Matza said he accepted his office's recommendations to cancel the trip, because it "harmed public and ethical considerations."

Teva initially chose 200 internists, urologists and other specialists and personally invited them to take part in the four-day event.

But when the company was told that personal invitations were not permitted by Health Ministry regulations, it contacted public hospitals and asked them to choose representatives.

When ministry medical services division director Dr. Yitzhak Berlovich learned of the plan, he informed ministry decisionmakers, and after deliberations that included Matza and Civil Service Commissioner Shmuel Hollander, it was decided to take the unprecedented step of calling the trip off.

The new regulations will not affect doctors in private medical institutions, but Barabash wants them to include physicians in voluntary hospitals and other public bodies that are not owned by the government or Kupat Holim Clalit.

Doctors may, through research funds, have pharmaceutical companies subsidize their participation in scientific conferences organized by professional bodies, but not conferences organized by commercial firms themselves, Barabash declared.

Knesset may vote on disputed public housing bill today

By LIAT COLLINS

The disputed public housing bill being promoted by MK Ran Cohen (Meretz), which would allow residents of public housing to buy their homes at a discount, can come up for second and third readings this week, following a decision yesterday by the Knesset House Committee.

The committee rejected a request by coalition and Likud whip Meir Sheerit, who two weeks ago got the cabinet to approve regulations he drew up on the issue, to declare Cohen's bill "new." This would have required it to go back through all the previous committee stages and preliminary and first readings.

Sheerit had claimed that, since there were now government regulations on the issue, any further legislation had to go back to square one and be debated again, taking the new circumstances into account. Instead, the bill could be voted on tonight.

Both Cohen's bill and Sheerit's regulations would allow long-term residents of public housing to buy their homes at a large discount.

But whereas Cohen's bill emphasizes the number of years of residency in determining the size of the discount, the regulations focus on the location of the apartment, giving preferential terms to those living in development towns and peripheral areas.

Outside the Knesset yesterday, demonstrators pressed for passage of Cohen's bill. They said Cohen's bill is more generous than Sheerit's regulations, and that the regulations discriminate against those living in large cities.

The argument between Cohen and Sheerit has dogged Cohen's bill and at one point Sheerit turned the vote on it into a no-confidence motion to delay its passage, despite the anomaly of a coalition whip filing a motion of no-confidence in his own prime minister.

Sheerit is now threatening to file more than 1,000 reservations to the bill if it comes up for second reading this evening, which could result in hours of discussion and require it to be returned to committee.

He might also call again to turn the vote into a no-confidence motion, which would postpone it until after the three-month recess. Cohen said the bill should be passed by the end of this Knesset session even if the session has to be extended by a day, to Thursday, to do so.

Sheerit, on the other hand, said: "There is no way the Knesset can finish the legislation of this law before [tomorrow], when it leaves for recess. The opposition cannot pass a bill through violence."

Sheerit complained at the Knesset House Committee meeting yesterday that he had not been allowed to address the Knesset Economic Committee, chaired by Labor's Avi Yehzekel, when it discussed Cohen's bill.

Cohen accused Sheerit of "playing a dirty trick which was aimed at sabotaging the bill which is expected to have a majority, and harming thousands of families who could purchase their homes if it passes."

Automatic citizenship bill passes first read

Ending Russian aid to Iran

The Knesset yesterday passed on a first reading a bill by Meretz leader Yossi Sarid to grant non-Jewish, first-degree relatives of IDF soldiers automatic citizenship under the Law of Return.

The vote was 53 to 28 with five abstentions. It was delayed from last week when religious parties sought to turn the vote into a motion of no-confidence.

Industry and Trade Minister

Natan Sharansky insisted that the government support the bill on the understanding it would be amended in committee between first and second readings.

An amendment proposed by Yisrael Ba'aliya whip Roman Bronfman would apply the bill only to relatives of soldiers who have obtained citizenship under the Law of Return.

Bronfman said this would cover "scores and perhaps hundreds" of families of soldiers. Gafni maintained that there are 120 such cases.

In a separate meeting, Interior Minister Eli Shais (Shas) suggested that the Interior and Immigration and Absorption ministries establish a joint committee to handle the cases of soldiers' relatives who have been denied citizenship until now.

Sarid called the bill "a message to the religious parties that we are fed up and won't take any more."

Others among the bill's supporters were four Geshet MKs and three Likud MKs as well as the Third Way's Alex Lubotzky. Only six Likud MKs were opposed. Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi was among the five abstentions.

In a meeting with visiting members of the Russian Security and Defense Committee, MK Ephraim Sneh (Labor) said yesterday that "Russian aid to Iran represents a strategic question for Israel's existence and Russia must stop it."

He presented the delegation with a list of five Russian companies allegedly helping to develop the Iranian Shitab 3 missile project.

Sneh said that these companies do not appear on a list that the Russian government has announced would be investigated for exporting know-how to Iran. He said this means there is reason to believe the aid is continuing.

The delegation, led by Ryabov Alexander Ivanovich, the committee chairman, and Deputy Chief of General Staff Klislin Mikhail Viktorovich, said that Russia is taking action and that Israel need not be so worried.

Annexation bill

MK Naomi Chazan (Meretz) has submitted a bill to require an 80 MK majority for any vote to annex territory. She said the measure was needed to handle a possibility that the government would try to make border changes next year when the interim period defined in the Oslo Accords is scheduled to end.

"If the government carries out acts of annexation it could bring about a disaster from a point of view of diplomacy and security," Chazan said.

Knesset panel debates state's role in promoting Jewish education abroad

By LIAT COLLINS

Some 70 percent of Diaspora Jewish youth get no Jewish education, according to figures presented yesterday to the Knesset Immigration and Absorption Committee, which discussed Jewish education in the world.

The committee also reviewed a plan that would bring Jewish youths to Israel for 10-day visits in the year 2000, in a project jointly funded by the state and foreign donors.

"The state should take more responsibility on itself for the whole Jewish people and be much more involved in the overseas communities," committee chairwoman Naomi Blumenthal (Likud) said. "It's almost the only guarantee of the continued existence of the Jewish people in the Diaspora."

Amos Hermion, who chairs the board of the Jewish Agency's education division, reported that only 30% of Jewish youth in the Diaspora get any Jewish education.

"I am a partner to your concerns for the future of [Jewish] youth there and its link to Judaism and Israel," he said.

He said some 15,000 young people from Western countries visit Israel annually at the initiative of the Jewish Agency, and another 100,000 Jewish youths take part in summer camps abroad operated by the Jewish Agency.

He said the Jewish Agency's operations are dependent on donated funds, which are dropping.

"The government must recognize that the young generation in the Diaspora represents a strategic asset and should invest suitable resources to bring the younger generation closer to Israel," Hermion said.

The prime minister's adviser for Diaspora affairs, Bobby Brown, told the committee the premier had agreed to establish a fund run by the state, Jewish groups and Jewish donors "which aims to bring every Diaspora Jewish child for a visit to Israel as early as by the year 2000."

He said the government is also acting to try to reduce the high tuition in Jewish schools abroad.

MK Shmuel Halpern (United Torah Judaism), who initiated the committee discussion, said the low rate of involvement in Jewish education explained the high assimilation rate.

"If this situation continues, we will in effect be lost. In another generation or two they won't even know they are Jewish," he said.

MK Naomi Chazan (Meretz) also said the government should be more active "or we will lose a large part of the Jewish people."

Binyamin Ish-Shalom, director of Beit Morasha, the Center for Advanced Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, told the committee there is a drop in the motivation of Jewish communities abroad to support Jewish education.

"The distance between these communities and the state is widening and we are responsible," he said.

The director of Beit Hatefush, David Alexander, presented a survey which indicated that 37.4% of Israelis believe Diaspora relations today are weaker than they have been in the past, 17.6% believe they are stronger and 32% believe there has been no change.

More secular Jews are convinced the relationship has weakened (43.2%) compared to traditional Jews (33%) and religious Jews (31.4%).

Almost a third of those surveyed (31%) believe Israeli schools should teach about the Diaspora and Jewish schools abroad should learn about Israel. Just over 24% believe Israeli and Diaspora schools should adopt each other.

Drori won't be replaced at Antiquities Authority

By AMY KLEIN

Education Minister Yitzhak Levy will not remove Antiquities Authority Director Amir Drori, but plans to add four rabbis to the Archeological Council, the minister's spokesman said yesterday.

The decision follows last week's meeting between the minister and the members of the Israel Archeological Council, which serves as an advisory body to the minister and oversees the Antiquities Authority.

Moshe Kochavi, the council's chairman, said council members voiced strong opposition in last week's meeting to the minister's reported plans to replace Drori because of pressure from the religious parties.

"We told him he can't appoint someone who is not professional," said Kochavi. "We will not cooperate with someone like that."

"Drori will complete his term as director," Levy's spokesman said. Drori's term ends in April 2000.

Drori said he preferred not to comment, because he had not officially heard from the minister or the ministry.

Kochavi does not know who the four new rabbis are that Levy promised to appoint, but said he hopes that have a "professional or public connection to archeology."

If they do not, he said, "We won't accept their appointment without a fight."

The council currently comprises 30 senior archeologists and representatives of bodies in related areas, such as the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel.

It has the power to approve all archeological work in Israel, and it oversees special subcommittees, such as one for preservation, and one for granting licenses for archeological digs.

But only professional archeologists can sit on those committees, Kochavi said.

Tel Aviv women fear serial rapist

By CATHERINE COHEN

Women in Tel Aviv are living in fear following reports a serial rapist may be responsible for two brutal rapes since Friday. The two victims, both young women, were beaten so badly after they were sexually assaulted that they had to be hospitalized.

Last Friday morning, a 27-year-old woman from the Philippines was raped at knifepoint in her Rehov Sokolov apartment and left so brutally beaten she had to be admitted to Ichilov Hospital. On Sunday evening, a 27-year-old Italian tourist on her way to visit a friend was raped in the stairwell of a building on Rehov Hahashmonaim. She, too, was hospitalized at Ichilov.

"She was supposed to come and visit me," said the victim's friend, attorney Hemi Kasif. "He must have caught her before she entered the elevator. He lay her on the floor, stomach down, and did this evil thing in the stairs. He knew she was a tourist, because he spoke to her in good English right away."

"She succeeded in reaching my apartment. I opened the door and was shocked to see her bleeding with abrasions on her face. She shook and screamed. 'It happened here! He's here! Call the police!'"

Kasif said the victim described the rapist as a skinny, dark-skinned man in his 20s with a dark ponytail and a low forehead, who spoke English well.

Cheryl Hechter, spokeswoman of the city's Rape Crisis Center, said that since the latest two rapes were made public, women have barged the center with calls.

"Many more people are calling than usual. We are trying our best to meet the demand for information and to educate the public about rape," she said. "People are scared and worried, since this has hit too close to home."

Because of similar patterns of behavior, police believe these two cases may be connected to some of the other rapes committed in the city over the past two years and are investigating the possibility a serial rapist is lurking in Tel Aviv.

Three of the recent rape victims in the city are not Israeli citizens and police are awaiting the results of laboratory tests to confirm whether these cases are related.

A police spokesman said it is too soon to tell whether or not there is a serial rapist on the loose. "As of now, it seems that two of the rapes were committed by the same man, but we do not yet know about the rest," the spokesman said. "In the meantime, the police considers catching the rapist a priority and is doing all it can to do so."

Ministry reassures on bovine growth hormone

The Health Ministry reiterated yesterday that there was "no proof" bovine growth hormone given to milk-producing animals causes any harm to humans.

The ministry was reacting to announcements by Truva and the Histadrut's Consumer Council opposing both the ministry's calming message and suggestions that the hormone be given to cows and sheep to increase milk production.

Ministry director-general Prof. Gabi Barabash said that both the World Health Organization and the US Department of Agriculture had reached the same conclusion about the safety of the hormone. "Therefore, there is no reason to prevent the marketing of milk products from cows that received the hormone," the ministry declared.

Ministry warns laser pointers are dangerous

The Environment Ministry issued a warning this week against the use of laser pointers in all forms - including on pens and key rings - saying that they can cause temporary blindness and in some cases irreparable damage to the eyes.

The ministry said it had accumulated evidence from around the world about the health hazards of finger pointers.

"It is prohibited in all cases to point the laser pointer in the direction of the face, and especially the eyes," the ministry statement said. "Children should not be permitted to play with the laser pointer, which is not a toy and can pose a real danger to the eye."

Ice pops produced by Haifa factory said unsafe

Ice pops meant for freezing at home that were produced by the Karhomim factory in Haifa Bay are not safe, according to the Health Ministry, which found "foreign bodies" in the liquid-filled plastic bags. The ministry said the company has been making the product without a license. The district food service office learned two weeks ago that a fault in production occurred, but the factory never reported it to the authorities. The breakdown included a failure in the pasteurization process.

Samples were taken, and shops were asked to remove the product from their shelves. Anyone who bought the ice pops before that should not eat them, the ministry said.

Thousands of teens join 'Israel Experience'

Over 8,000 teenagers from around the world between the ages of 16-18 have descended upon Israel for the Jewish Agency's "Israel Experience." Last week, 3,500 of these teenagers signed a copy of the Declaration of Independence in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary, after which they marched in formation from the Rose Garden to Mt. Herzl in Jerusalem.

The Israel Experience, a donor-funded project under the auspices of the educational division of the Jewish Agency, has brought over 13,000 students to Israel this year. The goal of the program is to have students experience Israel through seminars, lectures and tours.

Watch Kazakhstan

When it is predicted that a generally unknown country is to become the biggest oil exporter in the world, the international community suddenly sits up and takes notice.

The country is Kazakhstan, and a recent agreement it signed with Moscow to demarcate claims to the Caspian Sea could make it, after Russia, one of the most important powers to emerge from the breakup of the Soviet Union.

Bulat Sarsenbayev, political counselor at the Kazakh embassy in Tel Aviv, said the importance of the Caspian agreement in global terms cannot be over-emphasized. The oil reservoirs beneath the Caspian are believed to be vast, anywhere from five to 10 billion tons.

Since a main outlet for Kazakh oil will be a pipeline to Turkey's Mediterranean coast, the diplomat pointed out, Israel will be more than a little interested in this huge new source of non-Arab oil on its doorstep.

Most of us would be hard-pressed to visualize Kazakhstan without a reference book. It is one of those nations in the conglomeration of Central Asian states whose names end in "stan" - Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan. Stan means land, so these are the lands of the various regional tribes who give the newly independent countries their name.

Wedding bells

"Kazakh" means nomad, and Kazakhstan is the giant of the steppes, wandering 3,000 km. from the Volga to China's Altai Mountains across its vast land area of 2.7 million sq.km. (For comparison, its neighbor Kyrgyzstan has an area of less than 200,000 sq.km.) With a population of 17 million, Kazakhstan therefore is a hugely empty place with an average of seven people per sq.km., compared to Israel's 250.

Earlier this month the daughter of the president of Kazakhstan married the son of the president of Kyrgyzstan. The wedding, at a mountain resort in Kyrgyzstan, had more than a hint of dynastic royalty about it and was attended by four Central Asian presidents. The American-educated couple may have married for love, but in Central Asia the politics of the event are also taken for granted. Kyrgyz and Kazakhs are virtually the same people - Kazakhs are of the plains and Kyrgyz of the mountains.

Kazakhstan sits on top of the Great Silk Road of ancient times and sees itself as the pivotal state linking Europe and the Far East. In the seven years since it gained independence for the first time, Kazakhstan is one of the few members of the old Soviet republics to give the impression that it has an appointment with destiny - and is set on fulfilling it.

Carve up

If its efforts have been passing unnoticed by the Western media, that may be because Kazakhstan's strategic interests are intertwined mainly with those of Russia and China, notwithstanding the red carpet treatment it gives to potential Western investors.

Column One

has cultivated very close relations with Israel since diplomats were exchanged in 1992.

Regarding Russia, a landmark meeting between Presidents Boris Yeltsin and Nursultan Nazarbayev in June sealed three important agreements: a declaration of eternal friendship and cooperation, demarcation of sovereign rights in the northern Caspian and a protocol on Baikonur, the headquarters of the Soviet space program, which is in Kazakhstan. The space center will be rented to Russia for 25 years.

The Caspian agreement, which divides the northern seabed into Russian and Kazakh sectors on the median line principle, was a significant diplomatic coup for Kazakhstan, because it recognizes its claim to the oil near its coast and sets a precedent for future agreements. (It also provides equal access to fishing grounds).

Cheetah-stan

"Most deposits are in the north," said Sarsenbayev, "and we considered a quick agreement absolutely essential to make foreign investors in the oil industry feel comfortable, safe and secure."

The five Caspian states have argued for years over who owns the seabed oil. The three with oil near their coasts, Kazakhstan, Azerbaijan and Turkmenistan, want the sea divided into national sectors. But Russia and Iran, who have little or no oil on their Caspian coasts, wanted all the sea's resources to be shared among everyone. The issue of the southern Caspian sectors remains open.

Less high profile has been Kazakhstan's settlement of a border dispute with China dating back to the Soviet days - more than 90 percent of the disputed areas are now delineated.

The Kazakhs correctly apprehended their importance to China - for oil, for east-west air travel, for the transcontinental transit of goods. (The Kazakh foreign minister Kasymzhomart Tokayev was for years a diplomat to Beijing and speaks fluent Chinese.)

It was clear that rapidly developing China and increasingly important Kazakhstan could do without a squabble over empty mountain passes on remote borders. They are better left in the paws of nomad cheetahs and snow leopards.

Switzerland's identity crisis

Criticized as cold-hearted profiteers, the still staunchly neutral Swiss are struggling in the midst of a rapidly integrating Europe, to look to the future with a sense of pride.

By MICHAEL SHIELDS

ZURICH - Beautiful but unloved, Switzerland is suffering from a deep identity crisis as it celebrates its 150th anniversary as a modern state this year.

Painted by critics as cold-hearted profiteers from the misery of others, staunchly neutral amid growing political cohesion in Europe, the Swiss are struggling to look to the future with pride, confidence and a sense of belonging.

Peter Studer, editor-in-chief at Swiss Television, sees the search for identity rooted in the sweeping political changes that have crystallized around Switzerland, coupled with foreign critics' attacks over the country's World War II role.

"On the one hand it is Switzerland having to open itself up to face the new political form and content of Europe. This is taking place step by step," he said.

"On the other there is this Swiss bashing which is going on, especially in the United States, which is totally unexpected. Suddenly we are the evil guys of the world."

This image of being villains has come as a rude shock to the Swiss, long used to being admired for their high standard of living and top-quality products, if not especially well liked.

Europe's post-Cold War era dawned bleakly on Switzerland, ushering in seven years of economic stagnation that pushed unemployment at times to unheard-of levels above five percent.

Young people used to globetrotting between brief stints of well-paid employment at home suddenly found themselves unable to get any work, although the situation is starting to brighten now.

The European Union's integration left the neutral country out of step and isolated, a point driven home every time Swiss stand in line at passport controls with other non-EU citizens.

When accusations began to mount that Switzerland and its secretive banks had exploited World War II to enrich themselves, it became brutally clear to many Swiss that their country had no friends, only business partners.

"Many Swiss people are thrown into a state of uncertainty and start wondering how they are supposed to perceive themselves as Swiss," then-President Arnold Koller said last year as charges mounted that the Swiss had cashed in on the Holocaust.

"Many feel outraged and ask: Why? Why only now? And why Switzerland of all countries? Switzerland was neither involved in the deportations, nor did it know violent anti-Semitism. Why are we the center of attention and not the others?"

Traditional Swiss mistrust of foreign entanglements - to the point of eschewing membership of the United Nations - came home to roost as the weak federal government in Bern did nothing initially to counter a growing tide of anti-Swiss sentiment.

Many Europeans felt a sense of Negative headlines filled the vacuum left as the popular image of Switzerland as an Alpine wonderland of chocolate, fine watches, Heidi and yodeling shepherds evaporated. (UPPA)

"Schadenfreude" (enjoyment of other people's discomfort) as the smug Swiss - spared the direct impact of two world wars that devastated the continent - squirmed under intense scrutiny.

Negative headlines filled the vacuum left as the popular images of Switzerland as an Alpine wonderland of chocolate, fine watches, Heidi and yodeling shepherds evaporated.

Accusations that the Swiss were Hitler's bankers, hiding behind a charade of neutrality to do lucrative business, outraged a generation of Swiss who took up arms to defend their country against Nazi Germany and the Axis powers who draped a fascist noose around the country.

The attacks, which many Swiss thought were as inaccurate as they were vicious, left Switzerland's image in tatters and created a void of national identity that has yet to be filled.

"The existential question is: What is Switzerland for? What should it stand for? What is it good at? These questions are not being answered," Daniel Vasella, chief executive of giant life sciences company Novartis, told a recent panel discussion.

This hard scrutiny is making many Swiss wonder why they are getting most of the attention for an era in which few countries covered themselves with glory. They leave the soul-searching to intellectuals and complain about foreign "blackmail."

Even the United States sent back ships with Jewish refugees to certain death in the Holocaust, they say, also recalling how US officials interned innocent Japanese-Americans during World War Two.

One reader, tongue in cheek, wrote to a newspaper wondering how long it would be before it emerged that a Swiss - not a German - submarine sank the Lusitania ocean liner in 1915.

Koller summarized the popular mood when he told parliament that Switzerland had to examine and weigh its own history.

"Even if the final reasons and factors why Switzerland was not attacked during World War II remain a secret, today we do not have to feel ashamed that we escaped the war," he said.

Critics ignore Switzerland's humanitarian traditions, the 300,000 foreigners it took in during wartime, the good offices it provided to help settle conflicts, he noted.

But he said it was up to historians and the public to decide if all Swiss had lived up to the high moral demands in the dark days of the war, when Switzerland turned back thousands of Jewish refugees as the Holocaust raged and its central bank bought tons of gold from Nazi Germany that it knew was looted.

The historical review launched by Bern is continuing, but the Swiss now seem increasingly inclined to close ranks and reject criticism amid demands for financial compensation from the World Jewish Congress and Holocaust victims who are suing big banks.

In the past, the Swiss have turned to their 700-year history and sumptuous Alpine nature as unifying themes for citizens who shared neither a national language nor a national culture.

These subjects united a country that arose in its modern form 150 years ago from a civil war pitting progressives - eager for a centralized, federal state - against traditionalists who saw the agrarian cantons as their home.

Francophones in the west, majority German-speakers in the north and east, Italian-speakers in the south and the small group of ethnic Romansh in mountain valleys still often have little in common other than their mutual desire to be Swiss.

They see themselves as upright, honest and unobtrusive people who have become wealthy by dint of hard work and geography that put them astride European trading routes.

The Swiss tend to show a conservative streak when asked in frequent referenda to approve initiatives in foreign and domestic policy.

They voted in 1992 against strengthening ties with the rest of the continent in the European Economic Area, a vote that exposed the split between pro-Europe francophones and more isolationist German speakers.

They have voted against sending peacekeeping troops abroad, and rejected joining the United Nations. They maintain a 400,000-man militia army and strict neutrality at a time when the end of the Cold War has many searching for reasons why.

And they keep a close eye on one another, as anyone who parks illegally or disposes of rubbish improperly soon finds out. Marc Faber, a Swiss investment adviser known as "Dr Doom" for his normally gloomy forecasts, told a newspaper interviewer that he could never move back to Switzerland from his home in Asia.

"I like Switzerland as a country. But the biggest Swiss malaises are envy and jealousy. There is no society in the entire world that is as envious and jealous," he said.

The crisis of confidence has placed a huge burden on the government, a seven-member collective executive that for decades has made quiet compromise, not bold leadership, its watchword.

"The role and the shape of the federal government have not been reformed in 150 years. They are exactly the same as they were then," Studer said. (Reuters)

Kosovo conflict escalates as sides exchange fire

By DOUGLAS HAMILTON

PRISTINA, Serbia (Reuters) - Reports of Serbian progress in recouping control of the Pristina-Pec road emerged amid a potentially explosive escalation of the conflict when Albanian and Yugoslav federal army border guards exchanged fire.

Meanwhile, Serbian security forces have captured a key stronghold of ethnic Albanian gunmen which had blocked a major road across the province of Kosovo, state media reported yesterday.

Serbian state television aired what it described as footage of ex-Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) positions in Lapusnik, "a notorious terrorist base" which it said security forces wrested back on Sunday.

"The decisive action by the police, which came under fierce fire from mortars, portable rocket launchers, heavy machine guns and automatic weapons, managed to rout the...terrorist gangs in this terrorist stronghold," it said.

The footage showed trenches and bunkers, ammunition, communication equipment, a heavy machine gun, rebel uniforms, food stores and a makeshift surgery.

It was not immediately possible to verify events for lack of foreign access to the area, some 25 km west of the regional capital Pristina.

But if true, Lapusnik's capture would underline an apparent shift in the tide of fighting, which saw the KLA seize up to half of Kosovo since February, only to get knocked backwards by an army and security police counter-offensive in recent days.

The KLA's momentum started to falter when it was beaten back by superior Serbian firepower in an attempt to take its first major town, Orahovac, a week ago.

And a major Yugoslav army and police campaign appeared to get under way on Friday in central Kosovo with the aim of reopening a main east-west artery cut for months by the KLA.

Both Albania's Interior Ministry and the Yugoslav state news agency Tanjug reported shooting across the border in the same area early on Sunday morning but predictably differed on who was to blame.

The Tirana Interior Ministry said "Serb soldiers opened fire towards the police building at the border checkpoint in Morini, Kukës district" and tried to shoot their way through but were stymied by return fire.

Blair promotes allies in cabinet reshuffle

By GERRARD RAVEN

LONDON (Reuters) - British Prime Minister Tony Blair fired four ministers yesterday and promoted loyalists to key positions in the first reshuffle of his cabinet after 15 months in office.

The moves were more extensive than expected and enabled Blair for the first time to stamp his mark on a cabinet carried over from opposition, the make-up of which, under Labor Party rules, he had to accept when he came to power.

The most eye-catching appointment was that of Peter Mandelson, the architect of Labor's election victory, to the post of trade and industry secretary.

Mandelson had long sought a departmental job of his own, partly to shed the reputation as a shadowy media manipulator that has earned him the nickname "Prince of Darkness" and made him unpopular among rank-and-file Labor members of parliament.

He had been tipped for the role of cabinet troubleshooter, but this went to former agriculture minister Jack Cunningham, 58, a safe pair of hands who has served under six Labor leaders.

As cabinet office minister, Cunningham will have the job of harrying ministers across departmental boundaries to make sure they implement Blair's agenda.

The other key promotion was that of Alistair Darling, a Blair loyalist who won plaudits for overseeing a recent comprehensive review of government spending in his job as chief secretary to the Treasury.

Darling gets what could be an even tougher job - overhauling Britain's sprawling and expensive social security system.

Political commentators said Darling's appointment reflected Blair's deep disappointment that outgoing Social Security Secretary Harriet Harman - who was sacked despite her loyalty to Blair - had failed to get to grips with welfare reform.

Harman's deputy, free-thinking Frank Field, announced he was resigning from the government, giving Darling a free hand.

Blair sacked three other ministers: Transport Minister Gavin Strang, Public Services Minister David Clark and the leader of the House of Lords, Lord Richard.

Three nuns shot dead in Yemen

SAN'A, Yemen (AP) - Three nuns who worked with the late Mother Teresa's Missionaries of Charity were shot to death yesterday as they left their clinic in the Red Sea city of Hodeida, a Yemenite security official said.

The official said one of the Roman Catholic nuns was from the Philippines and two were Indian.

They were killed by gunmen carrying automatic rifles, he said. There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack.

Authorities have arrested one person believed to have been involved in the attack, the official said. He did not identify the suspect in any way.

The official said Yemenite President Ali Abdullah Saleh promised to direct the investigation into the incident.

The Missionaries of Charity, based in Calcutta, have operated medical clinics in Yemen since 1970 and never have been attacked before, Yemenite officials said.

The incident is not believed related to the ongoing battles between Yemenite tribesmen and the government over price hikes put in place under an economic reform program supervised by the International Monetary Fund.

Since the price increases went into effect on June 19, tribesmen have blown up oil pipelines, ambushed ministers, motorcades and opened fire on government buildings.

TOKYO (Reuters) - The US looks set to give Japan's next cabinet the benefit of the doubt as to its commitment to fixing the nation's economic ills, but will not ease its intense pressure for quick and convincing action.

US Secretary of State Madeleine Albright has already given Foreign Minister Keizo Obuchi - expected to be formally installed as prime minister later this week - a friendly but firm message to take quick steps to restore Japan to economic health and help the rest of Asia out of its financial crisis.

In reply, Obuchi promised to act promptly and reiterated his campaign pledges of a six trillion yen ($42.2 billion) tax cut and an extra budget worth 10 trillion yen, US officials said in Manila, where the two met at an annual session of ASEAN, the Association of South East Asian Nations.

Washington, along with financial markets, is now watching to see who Obuchi, the winner of last Friday's three-way race for the presidency of the ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP), selects to fill key cabinet posts later this week.

US to keep pressure on Japan

ANALYSIS

By JIMMY KATZ

But an LDP source told Reuters that Miyazawa, 78, was unlikely to accept and that Obuchi really wanted to tap former LDP secretary-general Koichi Kato for the post.

Miyazawa's close ties to key US economic figures such as Federal Reserve Bank Chairman Alan Greenspan could be a plus in dealing with a Washington irritated by years of Japanese policy delay and dithering.

Miyazawa, who has held the finance post before, speaks English and his daughter is married to Christopher La Fleur, the charge d'affaires at the US Embassy in Tokyo.

Kato, meanwhile, might not be the favorite choice of US officials, given doubts about his commitment to drastic banking sector reform and worries he might oppose a very loose fiscal policy because of concern about Japan's big budget deficit.

Conservative veteran Seiroke Kajiyama, who placed second in the race for LDP chief, is still the darling of financial markets for his "get tough" stance towards Japan's bad loan-laden banks. Talk that he would not get the finance post helped send Tokyo share prices into a nose-dive yesterday.

Actions, however, will weigh far more heavily with Washington than personnel line-ups and promises.

Communists vow to block US-Russia naval moves

VLADIVOSTOK (Reuters) - Communist hard-liners vowed yesterday to block joint naval exercises between the US and Russia's easternmost port of Vladivostok planned for next week.

The local branch of the Communist-led National Patriotic Forces Union (NPSR) said plans to land US marines near Russia's key Pacific naval base were humiliating to national pride and threatened the country's security.

As a part of joint maneuvers held every two years since 1994, US marines were scheduled to land in Ussury Bay on the fringes of Vladivostok on August 6. A spokesman for the Pacific Fleet said no shooting exercises were planned.

"This action cannot be considered other than a provocation and a blow at Russia's national pride," the NPSR spokesman Alexander Reznichenko said.

"The NPSR believes reactionary circles in the United States and NATO are working out plans to establish military control over Russia and its people."

Russian Communists blame President Boris Yeltsin's government for developing cooperation with NATO, which they believe is hostile to Russia.

Bombay lunch-box brigade brings workers meals

By DEXTER FILKINS

BOMBAY — Lunch hour descends on this humid commercial city, and the archaic hustle begins.

A thousand men pour in from the old British train stations, all shouldering the same shiny cargo and all wearing the same frantic stare.

They glance at their watches, mount their bikes and disperse into the traffic and heat.

Minutes later, in an air-conditioned office, Rajesh Sori takes his delivery: a six-course lunch, spirited from the suburbs so carefully that his favorite Indian foods, dal and chapati, still glow with the warmth of home.

"I only eat home-cooked food," says Sori, 34, sighing. "Food cooked by my wife." The man who has made this possible — the man who met Sori's wife at her door at exactly 8:45 a.m., cradled the lunch through the chaos of the Bombay trains and handed it off to another courier, who pedaled it across the city and into the diamond grader's hands at exactly 12:45 p.m. — considers the money he has earned for his efforts: About 12 cents.

"It's hard work," says Vithal Dhra, 40, a sinewy father of two.

"But I couldn't get this job in the village."

Dhra is known as a "dabbawallah," one of the legion of mostly illiterate, mostly village-born men who scratch out a life by toting hot, home-cooked lunches from Bombay's sprawling suburbs to middle-class office workers downtown for a few rupees a day. The dabbawallahs are one of Bombay's oldest and quirkiest institutions, sustained by a ceaseless stream of cheap labor, one of the world's most extensive commuter train networks and the historical willingness of Indian wives to stay home and cook.

Today, as this urban area of 15 million craves into the modern age, the dabbawallahs are feeling left behind. More women work outside the home and don't have time to cook. Fast-food joints are popping up between the office buildings. As businesses toughen themselves for Western competition, fewer employees have the time to dig into multi-course lunches.

Many of Bombay's dabbawallahs say their services are needed less and less, no matter how fast they pedal.

And still the prospective "wallahs" arrive, pouring out of India's impoverished villages into a labor pool so large that dabbawallahs must always fend off new competitors scouring their neighborhoods for clients.

At Bay Bites, a sandwich stand squeezed between Bombay's modern office buildings and the Arabian Sea, some doubt whether the dabbawallahs will last into the next century.

"My father ate a hot lunch cooked at home every day for 40 years," accountant Nani Daruwalla says between bites of a mutton burger. "Times have changed. Lifestyles have changed. My wife works. We don't have time."

The term dabbawallah derives from the Hindi words "dabba," for the bucket-sized metal containers, or tiffins, that most of them use, and "wallah," which means, roughly, "guy." India's cities are full of wallahs of every sort, performing unpleasant tasks or selling meager items for pathetic salaries.

"Dhobiwallahs" do laundry by hand, usually for about 5 cents per piece. "Bidiwallahs" sell cigarettes and betel, the leaves many Indians like to chew as a stimulant. "Doddwallahs" deliver milk.

The dabbawallahs, who number between 1,000 and 5,000, are exclusive to Bombay, India's commercial center. They grew up around the city's extensive commuter train network, begun by the British in the 19th century, which ferries 5.5 million people a day to and from their jobs.

The collection and distribution of the tiffins

Baban Iyerkar, 35, says he'll do this job as long as his body will let him — and as long as there are people who want their lunches delivered hot.

each day is a miracle of timing and organization performed by a work force that cannot read or write.

"I've been having my lunch brought from home for 13 years, and I think they've failed to bring it on time maybe three times," says Dominic D'Souza, a clerk in a Bombay textile firm.

THE sky is still pink over Bombay when Baban Iyerkar checks the air in his dres before starting on his way. Iyerkar lives in a tin hut with eight other people in an encampment called Kutir Sangam, which nudges one of Bombay's nicer neighborhoods. Kutir Sangam smells of filth and closeness, its 3,000 settlers working and living in pools of muddy water that remain for days after the rains.

Iyerkar, 35, in white flapping pajamas and Nehru cap, pedals his bulky, black bicycle for 25 minutes before coming to his first pickup.

It is 7:45 a.m. — he is right on time. Pallu Madhavani comes to the door, tiffin in hand.

Iyerkar hooks the tiffin onto his bike and begins pedaling to his next stop 10 minutes away. There he meets Jyoti Desai, who hands him a tiffin full of the Indian culinary pillars: rice, cabbage, chapati and dal. She has prepared the feast for her daughter, Vibha, a bank clerk.

And so Iyerkar continues, pedaling and collecting, for the next three hours, riding nearly 10 miles, gathering 30 tiffins in all, until he reaches the Santa Cruz station just in time to make the 10:34 a.m. train to downtown.

In the minutes before the train comes, Iyerkar parks his bike and puts his 30-pound load onto a wooden pallet. The train arrives, stopping for 10 seconds, long enough for Iyerkar to shove himself and his cargo past the crush of riders and into a car.

The 40-minute ride into Churchgate Station provides Iyerkar one of his few respite from a day of nearly ceaseless work. Yet, like many dabbawallahs interviewed for this story, he complains only when prodded.

Like other dabbawallahs, he is part of a team — his has 22 members — that has divided up most of the suburbs of Bombay. On the train ride, dabwallahs are leaping on and off at every stop. The crucial — and most esoteric — part of his day comes when he arrives, at 11:15 a.m., at Churchgate Station in downtown Bombay. Each morning, and almost at once, hundreds of dabbawallahs converge at the city's 96 train stations and split up into their teams.

Just as Iyerkar collects his tiffins in a certain suburb, so he is assigned to deliver tiffins to a specific section of downtown Bombay.

When the teams converge, they swap their tiffins according to the color codes atop each lunch box.

Once understood, the symbols tell the wallahs everything they need to know: where the tiffin should be picked up, whether and to whom it should be handed off and where it should be delivered.

Loaded with his final batch of tiffins, Iyerkar mounts his second bicycle, stored at Churchgate, and pedals into the steaming Bombay traffic. By 12:30 p.m., he has delivered most of his lunches, some in insulated tiffins to ensure that they are warm on delivery.

For his efforts, he receives the equivalent of about $3.75 a month per customer. With 30 paying customers, that means he is bringing home just over $28.50 a week. That's the limit, Iyerkar says: Any more customers and he wouldn't be able to deliver on time.

At 1:30, Iyerkar is up again, collecting his tiffins, hooking them to his bike to begin the routine in reverse. He will cycle back to the train, ride it to Santa Cruz, pedal the 10-mile loop, dropping off each tiffin at the house of its owner. He will finish, he hopes, by 6 p.m.

Lifting himself onto his bike, Iyerkar says he'll do this job as long as his body will let him — and as long as there are people who want their lunches delivered hot.

"When I'm too old, I'll go back to my village and work the fields." (Los Angeles Times)

Religion and unity

It is not what was said, but who said it. Education Minister Yitzhak Levy stunned the audience at Kibbutz Kfar Blum recently by speaking out against religious legislation. To most, the National Religious Party's new leader symbolized its steady movement rightward — both on the peace process and in terms of influence by outside rabbis, such as Levy's own mentor, Rabbi Mordechai Eliahu. The question is whether Levy's speech means that the NRP will begin to play an active role in reshaping the relationship between religion and state, or whether the aim will be to salvage as much of the status quo as possible.

According to Levy, "The subject of Shabbat is decided already... Stores and malls are open, and only the matter of public transportation remains."

"My heart aches when [bread] is sold on Pessah, but it must not be legislated [against]. Whoever wants to eat pork — let him eat. There is no place here for the establishment's involvement." As revolutionary as this statement is, Levy expressed an even more far-reaching sentiment on a follow-up interview with Yediot Aharonot: "We admit that religious legislation is an affront to religion in the eyes of the secular, and it is about time to develop a different way." In other words, it is not just a matter of recognizing that religious legislation has eroded over time, but that it has been counterproductive toward its own cause: promoting religion.

Even secular rights activists, such as Ornan Yekutieli of Am Hofshi, did not hide their enthusiasm for Levy's remarks, saying that the minister could be the bridge between secular and haredi worlds and the catalyst to finding a way to live together. But Levy still tries to draw a line between personal behavior and matters of personal status — such as marriage, divorce and conversion. Here he seems unwilling to follow the full implications of his own statements. The personal-status issues, Levy argues, must be regulated by the religious establishment, because they concern not just individuals but "future generations." The question remains whether, even in this area, the existing system has not done more to undermine religion in society than to preserve it.

In 1975, for example, over 28,000 Jews were married by the Rabbinate. Twenty years later, the Jewish population had grown by 50 percent, while the number of marriages through the Rabbinate actually dropped to under 27,000. There is no way around these figures: The religious establishment has failed the institution of marriage in Israel. The fact that Israelis are getting married later in life may account for some of the gap, but mainly it is the thousands who choose a civil marriage abroad, or not getting married at all, over going through the Rabbinate.

Even if the Rabbinate reacted to Israelis voting with their feet on the issue of marriage, this would still not address other serious situations, such as the inability of "mixed" couples to marry in Israel. MK Roman Bronfman (Yisrael Ba'aliya) has introduced a bill to eliminate this problem by allowing civil marriage for such couples, which are particularly prevalent among Russian immigrants. A more sweeping bill, introduced by MKs Dedi Zucker (Meretz), Ran Cohen (Labor), and others, would open civil marriage to everyone and provide for Orthodox, Conservative, or Reform rabbis to perform religious marriages. Though this might be regarded as a radical change from the status quo, it should not be dismissed as hostile to the cause of religion in Israel.

Though Levy is only willing to admit that religious legislation is counterproductive regarding personal observance, such as Shabbat and kashrut, there is strong argument that the same logic applies to marriage and conversion. There is no denying the danger that, through differing approaches towards marriage and conversion, the Jewish people will split into different groups whose members cannot marry each other, or who do not regard one another as Jews. The question is whether this problem can or should be addressed by continuing the existing legislated monopoly of the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate.

The problem of differing Jewish streams not recognizing each other is certainly not a new one — it is discussed in the Talmud in the context of the bitter disputes between the houses of Hillel and Shammai. Though the Talmud reports different versions of how this conflict was resolved, one version was that it was not — but each side recognized "intermarriages" with the other for the sake of the unity of the Jewish people. Perhaps the greatest harm caused by the existing mixture of state and religion is that it has sapped the shared sense of destiny that is necessary to forge workable compromises between the major Jewish streams. The other great harm, from a religious perspective, is that the institutionalization of Judaism within the state has been at the expense of its place within Israeli society. This is the harm that Yitzhak Levy should recognize more comprehensively, and should be recognized by the haredi parties as well.

A party at work

Last week extremely discordant tones were heard in the Labor Party during an argument between those willing to grant Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu a parliamentary "safety net" — and those who refuse to do so in advance. Party leaders were sharply criticized for not presenting a united front and for revealing the differences of opinion between them.

This dispute, however, is of a particular nature. The ideological frame of reference within the Labor Party is firmer than ever. All members of the Knesset's largest faction believe that implementing the Oslo Accords and reaching agreement on a permanent settlement are the only way to lead Israel to security and normalization.

This unity of purpose is particularly telling in view of the increased danger of missiles and weapons of mass destruction, specifically on the periphery of the Middle East. In contrast to the period in which the party included hawkish such as Amos Hadar and Shlomo Hillel as well as doves like Yossi Sarid and Lova Eliav, the Knesset's Labor faction now comprises a group of people who are committed to withdrawal from the Golan Heights as part of a peace agreement with Syria, and to a Palestinian state in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip, in a peace agreement with the Palestinians.

The political disagreement is no longer strategic, but tactical: Should we withdraw unilaterally from Lebanon without prior agreement with Syria? Should a referendum following concessions on the Golan Heights be determined by legislation or is it preferable to allow the government to resolve this issue when the time comes? Would it not be best to inform Netanyahu, in advance, that the peace camp will not join forces with the Right in order to bring down his government if Netanyahu presents the Knesset with a proposal for implementing an interim agreement with the Palestinians?

The 18 Knesset members who requested that the Labor faction

Political disagreements in Labor are no longer strategic, but tactical hold a meeting to discuss this last question did not sign a petition, nor did they threaten to provide a "safety net" independently.

Anyone who considers the request for such a discussion to be a challenge to the party leader is mistaken and misleading. Today no one opposes Ehud Barak's leadership. There is no "Barak camp" versus any other camp, and the long period in which two camps existed in the Labor Party is over.

LABOR is still a party, even in the troubled times of a directly elected prime minister, a period in which so much focuses on the candidate's personality. The party holds faction meetings as well as meetings of the inner council and the central committee, and decisions are made at these meetings — even if there are arguments which may, on occasion, be stormy.

The Likud Party's institutions, in contrast, hold no meetings. The Likud convention is an enormous body, which meets on rare occasions, provides a forum for confrontation between the various groups (remember Booth No. 287) and then disappears. Political and social issues are not debated at all.

The Hebron Agreement, signed by the Likud government and the PLO, was not discussed by the party's central committee. In fact, there is no Likud Party, and Michael Eitan correctly defined this situation recently when he stated that the Likud has become a lobby for the prime minister's reelection.

The disagreements within the Likud are strategic: There are those who oppose Oslo vigorously, such as Ze'ev (Benny) Begin, others like Dan Meridor have, under protest, come to terms with Oslo. Some, such as Meir Sheerit, support the Oslo Accords.

The challenge to Netanyahu's leadership of the Likud is no secret: Benny Begin, Dan Meridor and David Levy all left the government primarily because of the prime minister's personality. Dan Meridor has announced that he will not run for the next Knesset on a list headed by Netanyahu. Ariel Sharon has informed the press he has no faith in Netanyahu and that he intends to run against him in the next elections.

Is the conclusion to be drawn from all this that it would be preferable if the Labor Party did not hold meetings of its institutions, thus concealing internal disagreements? Definitely not. I prefer serious discussion — which may create a sense of conflict — to autocracy. Nevertheless, it would undoubtedly be more prudent if the tones were a little less discordant.

The Cuba question

WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY JR.

Question: Will there be any change in existing policies on Cuba this year?

Answer: No. Because the Castro people are perpetually refused. Their lobby is a passo ostinato — drumbeat drumbeat — on congressional sensibilities.

By contrast, those who believe that the situation would improve if the embargo were repealed are wispy theoretical and conventional voices in the recesses of the mind, saying the correct thing, but getting nowhere.

Proponents of repeal argue that what would most probably follow the repeal of the embargo is a hefty infusion of US capital, which would relieve the economic hunger of some Cubans.

Perhaps that would strengthen the pro-liberty dissenters, perhaps not.

But the difficulty embedded in arguing for repeal is seen in the language: "the anti-Castro people." Of course those who believe the embargo is not a good idea, for instance Milton Friedman and the Pope, are hardly pro-Castro people; yet any exchange on the subject tends to bog down in a description of the latest Castro atrocity, and this is never difficult to come up with because he is a very reliable supplier.

I OPINED at a recent exchange at which the question of the embargo came up that I could see three reasons why we levied it.

The first is that we are persuaded that somehow the embargo will bring down Castro. When? On the 30th anniversary of the embargo? No. That's past. On the 40th? It is likelier that Castro will die of old age before the 40th anniversary of the embargo, or that a comet will fall on him.

The second reason is that our

Is there a statute of limitations on property theft by foreign governments?

pride is ruffled. We tried everything to stop Castro, and failed. We even tried to assassinate him, and failed. We are humiliated as a nation, and we are sore losers. So our policy becomes: Be unpleasant economically.

The third reason is the political pressure, which pays psychological dividends. Castro's economy goes down one degree; our satisfaction level goes up one degree.

But those who want to continue the embargo are also backers of the Helms-Burton bill. Its most tantalizing provision is on the face of it appealing. The bill dates back to 1996, and it says an American can sue any non-American company that engages in any economic activity with any Cuban entity that once belonged to an American corporation or individual, but was confiscated by Fidel Castro.

Now, all honorable impulses incline to applaud the sentiments that generated the law. Assume a hypothetical situation. The Montpelier Co. owned in 1959 a thousand-foot stretch of prime Havana beach with a 500-room hotel. Enter Castro, who confiscates it. Thirty-five years later, Castro contracts with the Forte's Co. Ltd. of London to reconstruct the hotel and get it operating again. Forte's also owns a hotel in Chicago. Under Helms-Burton, Montpelier can file a civil suit against Forte's and hold the Chicago hotel liable for damages. You see, Forte's has been dealing with stolen property.

It is heartwarming, this prolonged concern for stolen property. In the best of all possible worlds, the deadlock would be broken by negotiation: Forte's would send an ambassador to Montpelier and decide on some kind of division of profits from the restoration of the old hotel. That hasn't happened.

Dramatists take the hypothetical problem a step further. Theoretically, some argue, under the law you could petition the courts to take action against all intermediary carriers in the condemned deal, e.g. the planes and ships that brought men and material to Cuba to undertake the reconstruction. They are complicated in a stolen-property operation.

What's wrong with that? It is very appealing in theory. But it does raise vexing questions, e.g. do the Apaches still own Arizona, and does Nicholas Romanov of Switzerland still own the Winter Palace in St. Petersburg?

Is there a statute of limitations on property theft by foreign governments? The question is posed without an answer tucked away in the sleeve of the questioner. Punditry on this point is taking a one-day vacation.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

SPIKE'S SPLEEN

Sir, — While Spike Lee's filmmaking is maturing, his rhetoric and spleen, as shown in the interview "Spike's gotta have it" (Time Out, July 24) are pitifully undeveloped.

We, who understood the horrifying parallel between the 1930s in Germany and the 1950s in America joined the US Civil Rights Movement. We, who put our lives on the line so that American blacks would not continue to suffer the humiliation German Jews had been subjected to (pre-Holocaust) are appalled and offended by Lee's continuous whining and anti-Jewish jibes.

Lee's documentary was good — but not good enough. The Long Journey Home's message is sustained by the power of its script and visuals. The indictment of those who actively and tacitly permitted the suffering of the survivors is eloquently presented, without the sturm and drang of Lee's often heavy-handed messages. The better film won. It's as simple as that.

When Spike Lee gets off his buns — heavily padded with capitalist dollars — and marches for the protection of Jewish children in Argentina or black children in Rwanda and Angola, I'll begin to have more respect for him.

Meanwhile, Lee remains a 41-year-old juvenile, delinquent in his debt to blacks and Jews who paved the way for him.

REAL PEACE

Sir, — Gad Yaacobi ("Peace and the economy," July 15) adds his voice to the near mantra-like chorus of those urging Israel's government to move forward in the peace process for the sake of economic interests.

What is especially troubling about this constant refrain is the implication that the Israeli people need an economic incentive to make peace or the notion that greater foreign investment and increased Israeli exports can somehow provide an antidote to the dangers arising out of a poorly crafted peace agreement.

Israelis of all political stripes fervently pray for the day when mothers and fathers no longer need to spend countless sleepless nights worrying about their sons serving on the borders. All Israelis desperately yearn for an end to the heart-wrenching scenes of parents burying their young sons killed in battle. And there is nobody in Israel who would not gladly welcome a time when normal family life is no longer constantly disrupted by the requirements of annual reserve duty.

Indeed, far from needing an economic motivation for achieving peace, Israelis on the right of the political spectrum would be as ready as their counterparts on the Left to experience a drop in their economic motivation for achieving peace, Israelis on the right wing of the political spectrum would be as ready as their counterparts on the left wing to experience a drop in their economic standing in return for real peace.

Furthermore, it should be understood that the economic benefits which might result from a peace agreement between Israel were left hostage to constant threats of renewed violence from Arab leaders whenever they found something not to their liking. Witness the warnings from Hosni Mubarak on July 14 about Israel's possible destruction (no less) if the peace process continues to stall.

Real peace, if it can actually be achieved, is a nearly supreme value, infinitely greater than a higher GNP. But the dangers arising out of a peace agreement into which Israel is pushed by outside pressure and threats of violence, which reduces Israel's ability to act independently and increases her vulnerability, can in no way be mitigated by short-term economic gains. Therefore, contrary to Mr. Yaacobi's conclusion, Israel's government would be acting most recklessly if it allowed existential decisions concerning the peace process to be influenced by economic factors or considerations.

65 years ago: On July 28, 1933, The Palestine Post reported on the education in Palestine in general and on the extensive Jewish school system in particular. A great effort was made to promote cooperation between Jews and Arabs and Arabic was taught in nearly all secondary schools and training colleges. 50 years ago: On July 28, 1948, The Palestine Post reported that as for the past 43 years, Tammuz 20, the anniversary of Herzl's death, was observed as a Nation Day in memory of the man who gave political expression to the vision of a Jewish state. The UN Security

Mom vs. multitasking

As a schoolgirl, I had an ongoing argument with my mother. I would insist that I was perfectly capable of doing my homework while watching television as effectively as if I was huddled silently over my desk.

She begged to differ. Concentrating was the only way she believed one could successfully complete a job.

She entirely rejected my preferred method of doing homework: watching cartoons while gossiping with my friends on the telephone. Focusing on one thing at a time, she said, was the only way you could do anything my mother was usually multitasking herself: vacuuming, cooking, talking on the phone and soothing a screaming child.

Of course, back then, her activity fell under the far less glamorous category of "being a housewife."

Those of us who telecommute have become the masters of the ultimate challenge of multitasking.

"Oh," people exclaim with envy when I tell them I work from home. "I'm so jealous."

I know that they are conjuring up images of stretching out on a lawn chair with a laptop. I'm not saying that the arrangement doesn't have its advantages. But it is also true that work and household duties often become jumbled together into a mountain of multitasking hell.

I bet that even the most high-powered computer would overload trying to conduct an interview on the phone, send a story in over the Internet, supervise repairs in the house, run a load of laundry, monitor the news on the radio, cook dinner, and keep a toddler entertained, all at the same time.

As a heavy-duty multitasker, one runs the risk of losing friends and alienating acquaintances. There is a fine line between being efficient and being rude. There are times when I have been simultaneously talking to a friend on the telephone and putting a news story through a final editing process, when the friend asks in a cold voice, "Why do I hear clicking in the background?"

But the idea of committing the odd social faux pas does not bother me as much as the possibility that my true genius has gotten buried under all of this flurry of activity — and that my children's potential may also not be realized if they are similarly distracted. After all, could Michelangelo have completed the Sistine Chapel, or Beethoven composed great symphonies, with a cacophony of beepers, cellphones and modems in the background?

So while it is clear that under the modern definition of success — it's not what you do, but how many things you do simultaneously — I come out a winner, I can't get rid of this nagging feeling that Mom might have been right all along. Maybe we all would be doing a whole lot better if we just learned to concentrate?

The word originated as a term for the way a microprocessor keeps lots of computer programs running simultaneously. There is good news for us females here: multitasking is one area in which women are believed to have an edge. While men have been bred to do their best when focusing on a single-minded goal — hunting wild boar, running a race, competing for a client — women through the ages have been expected to be able to juggle many activities at the same time. Even while nagging me to concentrate on my homework, Saudi Arabian women are banned from socializing with men, other than close relatives.

Behind the veil

They can't deal face-to-face with men, and most work in fields traditionally reserved for females. But some Saudi Arabian women are opening their own businesses. Eileen Alt Powell investigates

A blue-uniformed guard outside the door is the last man you see when you enter the new "ladies only" shopping center in the Saudi Arabian capital of Riyadh.

What sets Al-Multaka apart from other malls is not that it's for women as customers but that it's owned, managed and staffed by them.

It's one sign of a surprising trend in this conservative kingdom that has seen a growing number of women working outside the home. Some work because they need the money, others simply because they have more chances to use their education.

Most work in fields traditionally reserved for women, such as education and health care, though some have started dabbling in retailing, marketing, banking and even industry.

To do so, they must accommodate strict Saudi social customs requiring women to be covered in public and segregated from men. And they have to be creative about travel in a country where women are banned from driving.

At Al-Multaka, which was opened by Saudi fashion designer Lama Aggag, women can check their floor-length abaya robes and head scarves at the door while they shop with assistance from an all-woman sales force.

Electricians and other repairmen come only at night, after closing hours, and a lot of management tasks that involve dealing with men are accomplished by phone and fax, said Laura Collins, Al-Multaka's general manager.

"We have very good relations with our customers clearing agents by phone, but we've never met them," said Collins, an American woman married to a Saudi businessman.

ECONOMISTS ESTIMATE that some 240,000 Saudi women are working and that their numbers are increasing annually as more schools, hospitals, banks and other institutions are opened to handle the kingdom's fast-growing population.

Still, working Saudi women represent just a fraction of the country's estimated 14 million nationals. In addition, some 600,000 foreign women, most from Asian and African countries, are employed in the kingdom, often as housekeepers and nannies.

"Social and family values are strong inhibitors to Saudi women working," said Omar Bagout, an economics professor at King Abdul-Aziz University in the port city of Jeddah.

"Girls are not brought up to see work as a career," he added. "Work is a transitory thing, something she does until she marries or has children."

A key reason is that Saudi Arabia adheres to the strict Wahhabi sect of Islam.

Women are veiled, educated in segregated schools and banned hotels and other tourist sites. Rula Shugart, an official at the United Saudi Bank in Jeddah, points out that women's banking is a growing business.

USB women's branches in the western region alone have increased to 11 from two in the past 14 years, she said, and some are larger than associated men's branches.

"In our religion, ladies have control of their own money," Shugart said. Women's branches "offer them privacy" as well as stock market services, letters of credit for trade and overdraft accounts to help businesswomen manage their cash flow.

Women who want to work in non-traditional fields say their biggest problem is finding employers who will hire them.

The government — an almost exclusively all-male preserve — bans women from getting licenses in real estate, engineering, contracting, and other professions deemed men's work.

But there are women working quietly in back offices in most of these fields, leaving the job of public contacts to their male colleagues.

Some women skirt the rules by using phones and faxes or networking with women friends to do market surveys, sell time-shares in resorts or arrange trade shows.

Things are changing, if slowly, because Saudi women are becoming better educated, said Aziza Mane'e, a professor of education at King Saudi University in Riyadh.

And despite the kingdom's oil wealth, "there are a lot of young couples who need two incomes to make it," she said.

Mane'e argues that "a big obstacle" to women working is their inability to drive — making them dependent on chauffeurs or buses where they must sit in the back, behind a partition.

Mane'e was among 47 women who challenged the kingdom's ban by driving through the streets of Riyadh in November 1990. For that protest, she and the other drivers were suspended from their jobs for three years.

"We didn't get public support then, even from the women," Mane'e said. "It's only a matter of time before this changes. I am sure of it."

The discord which has characterized the Labor Party of late was temporarily put on hold on Saturday night as Laborites and their spouses converged on the Kochav Yair home of party leader Ehud Barak and his wife Nava for a sing-along. The evening featured a harmonious duet between Barak and former prime minister Shimon Peres, whose acrimonious exchanges towards the end of last week destroyed any pretense of party unity. Labor secretary-general Ra'anan Cohen was also present despite the constant bickering between him and Barak. MK Uzi Baram, a former Labor secretary-general, arrived with his fiancée Ariva Eidan, with whom he is due to tie the knot next month. Others who joined in the singing included Rafi Edri, Haim and Paima Ramon, Binyamin and Dolly Ben-Eliezer, Yossi and Helena Beilin and most other Labor MKs.

JUST a few weeks after television owners received a bill for NIS 46 on top of the previously approved and in many cases already paid NIS 466 license fee for 1998, came the announcement that Chaim Yavin is returning to Channel 1 to his old spot as Mabat anchorman at a reported annual salary of NIS 1.3 million (although Yavin has denied this figure). The additional sum tagged on to the license fee, Broadcasting Authority director general Uri Porat told the Knesset and the public, was to offset the discount given to senior citizens. If that's

ANYONE who expected that the Egyptian Independence Day celebrations would provide an encore of the separate ceremonies of US Independence Day involving President Ezer Weizman and Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu was definitely disappointed. The president and the prime minister entered the reception area on the lawn of the Daniel Hotel, Herzliya within a minute of one another. Each was given a musical fanfare as they greeted Egyptian ambassador Mohammed Bassiouny and his wife Nagwa, but that's about as separate as it got. The two men and their wives shared a VIP table on the hotel balcony, and the only speech given on behalf of Israel was by Netanyahu. Popular as the president may be, it was Netanyahu and his wife Sara who attracted the crowd and who good-naturedly agreed to pose for photos with the public before sampling the Middle Eastern and Far Eastern cuisine. In his address, Netanyahu praised the leadership of Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak and described the relationship between Israel and Egypt as "sound and strong." With regard to the relationship between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, Netanyahu declared: "Peace is happening as we speak." Other ministers present included Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, Industry and Trade Minister Netan Sharansky, and Tourism Minister Moshe Katsav. Agriculture Minister the case, how can he justify the huge pay-out to Yavin? The general public was already unhappy about having to pick up the tab for the third age (of which Yavin is also a member).

Porat has long held Yavin in special esteem, appointing him head of Israel Television soon after assuming his previous term as IBA director-general. This time around, he made it known early on that he wanted to bring back Channel 1's old stars. He failed with Rafi Ginat but not with Yavin, who has been released from his contract with Channel 2 franchisee Keshet, and resumes his duties at Channel 1 on September 1, regardless of the fact that his ratings when he left last year were considerably lower than those achieved in the interim by Geula Even.

ANOTHER veteran but somewhat younger broadcaster, Alex Ansky has been deluged with fan mail since leaving his daybreak program on Army Radio. It's not that Ansky hasn't taken a break from the program in the past — but this time it's unlikely to be a temporary thing. By mutual consent, Ansky has relinquished the early-bird slot. Not all the fan letters were in Hebrew. Linda Livni, a Jerusalem listener, wrote an eloquent epistle in English in which she stated, "I wonder if I shall ever again see sweet clouds in the sky 'just for decoration' because without the pleasant filter of your eyes, the raging light of reality is blinding." Livni adds: "...I hoped by some miracle your magic would survive the forces of mediocrity, conceit and arrogance."

AND while on the subject of Army Radio, one of the newcomers to the station is Ido Shai, whose father Nahman Shai, currently director-general of the Second Television Authority, was formerly the commander-in-chief of Army Radio.

SECOND-generation broadcasters and print-media journalists are fairly commonplace in Israel. But, third-generation are still comparatively rare. One of the most recent members of this elite group is Roni Selinger, daughter of Tali Lipkin-Shahak and her first husband Benny Selinger. Lipkin-Shahak became the first woman military reporter in Israel while working for the now defunct Davar. Her late father Azaria Rapaport was the country's first official military reporter, and Roni Selinger has just been accepted to a communications course being conducted by IDF spokesman Oded Ben-Ami, former spokesman for Yitzhak Rabin and Rafael Eitan, who for the first time ever attended an Egyptian Independence Day Celebration. Arrived after the speeches as did Ehud Barak and Shimon Peres. There were many MKs in attendance, but not Shas leader Aryeh Deri, who was represented by his wife Yaffa. The huge cake with sphinx and pyramid decorations was not shared with the guests, but was donated by Nagwa Bassiouny to Schneider children's hospital.

FORMER Rand Daily Mail reporter Benjamin Pogrud, who was discredited by lying witnesses in a show trial following his 1965 expose on South Africa's shameful prison system, has learned that Willem Boshoff, one of several white prisoners who perjured themselves, has reversed his testimony with an apology to Pogrud and former Rand Daily Mail editor Laurence Gandar. After Gandar and Pogrud were found guilty, no South African newspaper reported on prison conditions for two decades.

Pogrud, who now lives in Jerusalem after spending many years in Britain and the US where he worked for leading publications and wrote several books, appealed last year to South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission to have his and Gandar's names cleared and struck from court records. He believes that they are about to be exonerated. The good news came just in time for Pogrud to include it in his new book being published in the US. The book is a tribute to those journalists who, at great risk to their personal safety, wrote stories exposing the evils of apartheid.

FIRST it was his new bathroom in the Knesset which got Knesset Speaker Dan Tichon into hot water. But that was just a trickle. If a cover story in last week's Jerusalem weekly Kol Ha'ir is correct, Tichon is in for a deluge. According to the article, there are certain irregularities and building excesses in Tichon's new home in Malcha. The story also alleges that Knesset maintenance workers did the renovations in Tichon's current home in Ramot as well as in his new abode. The question is whether Tichon will be able to put this episode behind him as easily as that of the Knesset bathroom.

Don't call it love

Dear Ruthie,
My problem started when I met this guy and fell in love. I didn't plan to love him. It just happened, in spite of the fact that I was aware of his being committed to somebody else. And don't tell me you can't fall in love with someone who is already committed to somebody else.

Then I began calling him all the time. Once I even told him how I felt. Finally, one day he told me that he loved his girlfriend and that I could find someone better. It really hurt when he turned me down, especially since he is the only man I really care for. So I ignored what he said and kept phoning. I know he is just humoring me because he is a civilized person. But after each conversation with him, I feel great emptiness inside, since I know he doesn't even like me.

On one occasion I even went so far as to try and seduce him. He stared at me, and said: "You didn't even cross my mind, let alone my heart." I felt really ashamed and rejected. He is the only guy that I thought I could surrender everything to.

Now it's been almost a month since I've heard from him. Every day I struggle not to call him. I don't know how long I'll be able to hold on.

I don't know what to do. It's as if my heart died and now I wish my body would die, too, so I could stop feeling the pain.

I know I'll never be in love again the way I love him. Lost in Love enables you to hold onto this man as a symbol, as opposed to forcing you to see him as a human being — with flaws. Therefore, you can believe that you will never be able to love anybody else the way you do him.

Your aim here should not be to "hold on" and not phone him. He is irrelevant. Your real goal should be to achieve the feeling of self-worth which will remove your desire to do so. All of us possess the inclination to seek out and use others to serve as proof of what we feel about ourselves. Many of us call this drive "love" — particularly when we succeed in finding a member of the opposite sex to play the role of catalyst for our most powerful negative feelings.

Professional counseling may not "cure" you of this "love." But if it can help you give a different name to the phenomenon, it will have been worth it.

Bell Atlantic and GTE discuss merger

By ANDREW BROOKS and DYLAN RATIGAN

Bell Atlantic Corp., the largest US local phone company, and GTE Corp. held talks about a merger valued at about $55 billion that would give the companies control of a third of the US local service market, said a source familiar with the discussions.

An agreement could come as soon as this week, though the talks may still break down, the source said. Bell Atlantic president and CEO Ivan Seidenberg declined to comment, as did officials at GTE, the No. 3 local company.

Shares of Bell Atlantic rose 7 1/2 to 45 5/8 in early trading. GTE fell 3/4 to 57 3/16. The combined company, with about $53.5 billion in annual sales and 63 million phone lines, would be a stronger competitor to SBC Communications Inc., the No. 2 local phone company, which recently agreed to buy Ameritech Corp. for $70.3 billion. The global phone industry is consolidating at an unprecedented pace as markets open to competition and companies seek to offer a full range of services through one bill.

"We're seeing a battle of Titans," said Jeffrey Kagan, president of market researcher Kagan Telecom Associates. "The companies all feel like they've got to get bigger."

The combination, first reported by The Wall Street Journal and USA Today, is sure to draw close scrutiny from US regulators. Bell Atlantic and GTE have extensive and overlapping local and wireless operations. Bell Atlantic is prohibited from providing long-distance services, while GTE has more than 2 million long-distance customers. "These are two companies that would have probably gone head-to-head against each other," Kagan said.

Bell Atlantic, which last year bought Nynex Corp. for $25.6 billion to get a lock on the local market in 13 states from Maine to Virginia, is facing increased competition from long-distance providers in its lucrative northeastern US market.

SBC is making a push there as well. It expects this year to complete its $5.97 billion purchase of Southern New England Telecommunications Corp., which provides local and long-distance services in Connecticut.

GTE, which provides local services in 28 states, last fall lost out to WorldCom Inc. to buy MCI Communications Corp., the No. 2 US long-distance company. GTE bid $33.5 billion, while WorldCom sweetened its offer to $41.8 billion.

Stamford, Connecticut-based GTE has been moving quickly to push into the fast-growing data market. Last year, it paid $616 million for Internet service provider BBN Corp., a pioneer in the industry, connecting companies to the global computer network.

At the same time, it bought part of Qwest Communications International Inc.'s 16,285-mile long-distance network, expected to be completed next year.

Other competitors are teaming up as well. WorldCom expects this summer to complete its MCI purchase, and yesterday AT&T Corp., the largest US long-distance company, and British Telecommunications Plc announced a $3 billion venture to offer voice, data and Internet services to large global companies. HSBC buys 4.15% Bezeq stake for $102m. as custodian for C&W

By DAN GERSTENFELD

US investment house Merrill Lynch & Co. has sold a 4.15 percent stake in Bezeq Israel Telecom to HSBC Investment Bank. HSBC announced last night. HSBC reportedly has agreed to sell the shares to British Cable & Wireless in the future.

Merrill Lynch said it sold the shares for $102 million, but declined to name the buyer. However, HSBC said it has purchased the shares.

Once the deal is completed, HSBC reportedly will sell the stocks to C&W in a hedging transaction, which allows the telecom company to acquire the 31 million shares at some point in the future for a price of $3.3 per share, which is close to Bezeq's closing price on Sunday on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange. Under the terms of the agreement, C&W would not acquire the shares before August 20 next year.

Earlier this year, Communications Minister Limor Livnat authorized C&W to increase its stake in Bezeq from 10.2% to 13%. It then purchased a 2.5% stake from Merrill Lynch for $63m., reflecting a price of NIS 12 per share ($3.30).

At that time, Livnat also gave C&W permission to increase its holdings to 20% after August 1999. It is therefore believed that HSBC acquired the shares on behalf of C&W, allowing the company to protect itself against a possible rise in the price of Bezeq stock, which gained some 35% since the beginning of the year.

Through the transaction, Merrill Lynch reduces its holdings in Bezeq from 6.42% to 2.27%. Merrill Lynch, the world's largest equities underwriter, purchased its shares of Bezeq a year ago as part of a deal in which it acquired a 12.5% stake in Bezeq from the government for $250m. Merrill Lynch paid an average price of about $2.6 per share, which is some 30% lower than Bezeq's current share price.

According to the agreement signed with the Government Company Authority, Merrill Lynch will transfer part of its profit to the government, which is expected to receive some $5m. from the recent deal.

The investment house said last month that it has purchased another 0.6% of Bezeq by acquiring stocks on the TASE. The move was probably an attempt to secure the deal with HSBC.

C&W also seems to be the obvious candidate to purchase Merrill Lynch's remaining Bezeq holdings. This can be done directly after August 1999, or through HSBC or another company meanwhile.

Central bank cuts rate by 0.3%

By DAVID HARRIS

The Bank of Israel's key lending rate will be cut by 30 basis points in August to 11 percent, the central bank announced yesterday.

This will be the seventh consecutive monthly cut, with interest rates having been cut 2.4% since the start of the year. Since the Netanyahu government came to power in 1996, the central bank's rate has been cut 6%.

"The decision was taken because of the current inflation environment and predictions concerning the influence of other factors, such as real activity in the economy and the development of prices abroad," according to a statement from the central bank.

The Bank of Israel said that the drop in rates since January has led to a reduction in the gap between Israeli and foreign interest rates. The bank once again warned of the need for caution in lowering interest rates, particularly in light of the financial uncertainty currently being felt in many of the world's capital markets as a result of the Asian crisis.

On the day the Central Bureau of Statistics published data showing unemployment rose to 9.3% in May, the central bank called for a reduction in the size of the public sector in order to allow for a reduction in the tax burden, while increasing expenditures on infrastructure. The bank also called for additional spending on research and development.

"The steps will contribute to the creation of jobs also in the short term," the statement read.

Meanwhile, the bureau published a variety of statistics for May and June which "don't point to a turnaround in economic activity."

Arkia buys new aircraft; opens Nigerian company

By HAIM SHAPIRO

Arkia, Israel's second-largest airline, is branching out further into the overseas market by setting up an airline in Nigeria. The company also is purchasing aircraft for some $300 million.

Speaking at a press conference in Tel Aviv yesterday, Arkia president and CEO Israel Borovich said that the company realized some years ago that if it wanted to expand significantly it needed to enter the market of charter flights abroad.

"We saw that the only way to grow was to go beyond the borders of Israel," he said.

The company is buying three ATR 72-500s for $55m. The aircraft, produced by the European Airbus Industrie, have 72 seats and are to be delivered beginning December of this year, mainly for flights to Elat.

Arkia also is buying two Boeing 757-300s for $125m., to be delivered at the beginning of 2000. These planes seat 265 passengers and are to be used for international flights.

In addition, the company is to carry out two new leasing deals. It is to buy two Boeing 767-200ERs from Air France for $43m. each and lease the aircraft to El Al for five years. Arkia is to make a down payment of $13.5m. for each plane and the aircraft are to be delivered in January and March 1999.

In the second deal, Arkia is to buy a Boeing 757-200ER for $36m. and lease it to an unnamed foreign airline until 2003 for $370,000 a month.

This is in addition to the 24 aircraft Arkia is presently leasing to other airlines.

Arkia is setting up a domestic airline in Nigeria together with Koor subsidiary Belton-Dizengoff and a Nigerian company. Arkia and Belton-Dizengoff each are to own 30 percent of the company and the Nigerian partner is to hold 40%, with an initial overall investment of $2.5m.

Arkia is to lease two or three of its Dash 7 aircraft, now being used in Israel, to the new company. Borovich noted that the planes are to be insured for their full value, with the insurance also covering possible political incidents. The aircraft are to be flown by local pilots, under the direction of Arkia.

Borovich said that the expansion plans are the result of an optimistic view of the development of the airline industry, including traffic to Israel by visitors from abroad.

"There will be an increase in foreign tourism for the year 2000, which will last much longer than that year. I see a very rosy future," Borovich said.

Government delegation to learn Euro ropes

By DAN GERSTENFELD
and DAVID HARRIS

A team of top civil servants will travel in early September to Brussels to study the implications for Israel of the introduction of European monetary union, Treasury Deputy Director-General for International Affairs Dan Catarivas said yesterday.

The group, which will include representatives of the Finance Ministry, Bank of Israel, Export Institute, and the Israel Securities Authority, will meet senior European officials from DG2, which is responsible for many of the European Union's financial affairs.

Catarivas, who will head the team, said the government's key role is to raise preparedness in the business community for the onset of the euro-currency, which will begin to come on stream on January 1. While funding has not yet been set aside for the purpose, Catarivas said his ministry will soon begin a publicity campaign aimed at getting the European message across.

However, unlike the Eurofile Bank of Israel Governor Jacob

Frenkel, Catarivas said Israel should not link itself directly to the European currency bloc. "At least not for the time being."

Frenkel is urging Israel to become closely aligned to the Euro bloc, rather than those of the dollar or yen. Frenkel maintains this is the logical step for Israel, whose largest trading partner is the EU, geographically the closest to the Middle East of the three major blocs.

Catarivas added that the domestic business sector is far from ready for the introduction of the euro. "Unfortunately there's not enough medium- and long-term preparation for the launching of the euro," said Catarivas. The first sector that must be ready for the euro is tourism, he said. By next summer, the industry will have to begin marketing euro-denominated holiday packages for Christmas and the 2000 celebrations.

While most of the business sector may not yet be ready, the five major banks have been preparing for this process for the last two years, said the Treasury's West European affairs coordinator, Marc Luban.

Building Blocks

By Nina Gilberg

INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE

Industrial Buildings, the country's largest real-estate company, is to establish a $200 million office-building complex in the Herzliya Pituah industrial zone. The project, Ackerstein Towers, will become the largest complex in the area. It will consist of four, nine- to 10-story buildings of office and high-tech industrial space. The buildings are to be constructed on a 24-dunam area. The land was owned by Ackerstein Industries, which signed a deal for a joint-venture of the project with Industrial Buildings two years ago. A Hypercol branch is presently located on part of the site and will move into a 3,000-sq.-m. space in the new complex.

The complex will include 40,000 sq. m. of office space and 10,000 sq. m. of commercial space, which is to be accessible via a pedestrian walkway between the buildings. The space will be available for rental only. The project is to be built in two stages. The first stage will consist of two buildings and part of the commercial space, which will take about two years to complete.

Benco Modular Concepts has won two contracts worth NIS 8 million to supply space dividers for the new offices of Bank Hapoalim and Blue Square Co-op. Bank Hapoalim is establishing its new headquarters in Rubinstein Towers in Tel Aviv, on Rehov Hakevet. Benco is to set up dividers in some 10,000 sq. m. of space on 12 floors of the building, for some NIS 5m. Bank Hapoalim is scheduled to move into the new offices next summer. Blue Square Co-op awarded Benco a NIS 3m. contract for dividers in its new offices being constructed in Rosh Ha'ayin.

GNC, the US-based vitamin and health food chain, has rented a 150-sq.-m. space in Azrieli Center in Tel Aviv for its third branch in the country. The chain rented the space for $65 per sq. m. for 10 years, linked to the consumer price index. Some $300,000 was invested in the store. The chain has some 3,600 stores worldwide with annual revenues of $1.2 billion.

RESIDENTIAL

Jerusalem area

Twenty-five homes were sold during the pre-sale of the first phase of a new project in Mitzpe Nevo, a religious neighborhood in Ma'aleh Adumim. The company, A. Barkan & Co., is now opening the project, Ma'aleh Hatzofim, for regular sales and plans to begin sales of the second phase soon. Ninety terraced units, including cottages and apartments, are to be built in the project. Apartments will contain five rooms and cottages and garden apartments five to six rooms. Prices of the homes range from $185,000 to $265,000.

On Rehov Harav Berlin, a three-room apartment with a small, private garden was sold for $245,000 via Shiran. The home, which has some 70 sq. m., was sold after six weeks on the market. In Gilo, on Rehov Hagoma, a four-room 100-sq.-m. apartment on the third floor was sold for $185,000. The apartment was sold after a week on the market via Shiran.

Tel Aviv and center

Mishab, the building company that specializes in projects for the religious public, has sold 10 houses in the past month in Mishkanot Afek in Rosh Ha'ayin for some $2.7m. The project, being built at a cost of some $15m., is spread over a 21-dunam area and includes 69 single-family homes. Prices start from $240,000 for five-room, 144-sq.-m. homes with 100-sq.-m. gardens and from $275,000 for six-room, 165-sq.-m. homes with 150-sq.-m. gardens. The company said buyers in the project are divided equally among residents from Jerusalem and center of the country.

In Tel Aviv, a three-room 85-sq.-m. apartment on Rehov Hakermel near the sea was sold for $260,000 via Century 21. The apartment, which needs renovations, is on the first floor, but has no parking. The asking price was $260,000.

Near Kikar Hamedina, a two-room 55-sq.-m. apartment was sold by the agency on Rehov Shareit for $190,000. The apartment is renovated, but is on the second floor without an elevator or parking. The asking price was $210,000.

In Shoham, a five-room attached cottage on Rehov Nurit was sold for $295,000 via Anglo-Saxon. The house has 160 sq. m. of space and a 100-sq.-m. garden.

On Rehov Emek Ayalon, a six-room penthouse with a view was sold for $285,000. The house has 170 sq. m. of space with a 60-sq.-m. porch.

When push comes to shove

While push-technology companies in the Internet field have run into trouble, local start-up BackWeb is flourishing by focusing its attention on the corporate environment

When Lior Hass, co-founder and chief architect of start-up BackWeb Technologies, talks about "The Press," you can almost hear him growl.

It's not that Hass has got anything against the media personally. It's just that it has played a part in tarnishing the image of the push-technology industry, which has made his job a good deal harder.

BackWeb is one of the leading lights of the push-technology market. Just over a year ago that was something to be proud of. When push burst onto the scene it was hailed as one of the most exciting new technologies, the cure for all that ails the Internet. Six months on, however, as problems began to emerge in certain sectors of the industry, journalists rushed in to pronounce the entire technology dead.

"There was lots of hype at the beginning and lots of hype at the end," complains Hass.

The truth is that push technology is far from its death bed. In fact, for companies like BackWeb, it's not even ill.

In the last year BackWeb, which has headquarters in California and Ramat Gan, has increased its staff to 140, opened offices across Europe, and signed new five- to six-figure deals with leading Fortune 1000 companies such as Compaq, Intel, Network Associates (formerly McAfee), and Cisco. In December 1996, the company's market value was estimated at $60 million and since then sales have continued to grow at a healthy rate.

"We're doing very well," says Hass. "We're in good shape, have plenty of money in the bank and our investors are happy."

BACKWEB'S story began in November 1995 when it was founded by BRM Technologies with seed capital of $1.5m. and a staff of seven. It was a fortuitous start. BRM had a major hand in the success of Checkpoint Software Technologies Ltd., the market leader in global network security software and a company which in six years has grown larger than Koor.

Initially product development was carried out by BRM personnel and for the first six months, BackWeb worked out of BRM's Jerusalem offices.

After just two months, Eli

Barkat, CEO of BackWeb and one of BRM's three owners, moved to the US where he set up the company's American operations.

In mid 1996, Softbank Holdings Inc., which owns the largest high-tech publishing house in the world, invested $3m. in BackWeb, while in December 1996 another $13m. was raised in a second round of private financing. The lead investor was GS Capital Partners II, an affiliate of the Goldman Sachs Group. Other investors included Trinity Ventures, Intel, Polaris and Evergreen. Even before BackWeb officially released the first version of its product in September 1996, it had several customers, the first being the Wall Street Journal.

In the following months, BackWeb's customer base increased steadily.

Contracts followed with Lotus, McAfee, Diamond Multimedia, Expert Software and Microsoft. In 1997, BackWeb bought a Toronto-based competitor, Lanacom, and turned it into an R&D office.

Initially BackWeb aimed at both the consumer (Internet) and corporate (Intranet) markets, but 18 months ago it made a strategic decision to focus attention on the corporate environment. Today BackWeb's customers are almost exclusively from the corporate world.

"It may be less sexy than the Internet, but we realized that the corporate world is where the money lies," says Hass. "The average deal is significantly higher in terms of income. It's a different customer and a different sale. Corporations have a huge demand for technology that allows them to transfer information to their employees. They can't put information on an internal Web site and wait for people to come to them because they just don't come. They need to send the information to them."

It proved to be a wise decision. By the end of last summer it was clear that push-technology companies in the Internet field were running into trouble. Customers complained that systems were too slow, took too long to download and were too passive.

Much of this criticism, according to Hass, was specifically about Pointcast, the company which pioneered the technology and which then focused almost exclusively on the consumer market. It was not alone, however. Netscape and Microsoft had also tried to penetrate the consumer market with similarly disappointing results.

For the media, which had been loudly enthusing about the technology, the complaints spelled a rapid change in direction. "The press had hyped up push technology so much that when these companies didn't take off in the way they were expected to, there was a backlash, and the journalists assumed it was the end of push technology. It became 'in' to write that push is dead," says Hass. What they ignored, however, says Hass, was that it was only one area of push technology that was suffering. In the corporate world, the market was developing as rapidly as before.

"What the media really gets is the Internet," explains Hass. "Journalists are writing for a mass market. Their readers understand the Internet because many of them are home users. When they see an Internet technology, they think in terms of the end user. The company Mirabilis, for example, is all about home users. Everyone understands it. It's simple. Everyone and their mothers are using it. Once we made the shift to the corporate world everyone lost interest."

While it's impossible to say with any certainty how much the negative reports have affected BackWeb, Hass does believe that it has caused hesitation in his customers.

"The wave of negative press about the push market is not helping us," he says. "If someone is buying a product for a quarter of a million dollars, they want to know that the company is going to be there next year. If you're a start-up like us, it's not a given. We have to prove that we're here to stay. I think we're doing quite a good job of that. Once we are talking to our customers it's easy because we can show them the difference between what the press is talking about and what we are doing."

"I don't think we've lost any deal because of the press," he adds.

One positive outcome of all this trouble is that today BackWeb is the clear market leader. "We have almost no competition," says Hass. "In the corporate environment, we are absolutely the leader. There is no one close to us right now. Microsoft and Netscape have pulled the plug on push, and Pointcast has become a media company. We don't see them anywhere in our territory. This is one area where we did really great."

Today BackWeb's only real competition comes from companies who develop their own home-made solutions to distribute information. A year ago, analysts predicted that the push technology market would reach $4.5 billion by the year 2000. Today those predictions vary considerably depending on the analyst. Hass, however, still believes that it will become a multi-billion dollar market.

"We're absolutely sure that it's going to be a huge market," he says. "There's a really strong demand for push technology in the corporate environment."

As market leader, that could spell out a lot of revenues for BackWeb.

In the meantime, there's a lot of work still to be done. "It's not obvious to all Fortune 1000 companies that they need BackWeb. We have to make them realize that. It's really the role of the market leader to create and educate the market. That's one of our biggest challenges today, and we are investing a lot of resources in it."

Despite all the difficulties over the last year, Hass remains optimistic that the company's strong growth rate will continue, along with the expansion of the market. "The market is still very young and you usually see phenomenal growth rates at the start because there's so much room to grow."

In the next week or so, BackWeb expects to announce the completion of several major deals worth between $200,000 to $500,000 with leaders in the oil and gas, pharmaceutical, and distribution fields.

At the height of the push technology fiasco, it was fashionable to describe BackWeb as the new Checkpoint. Hass still likes that comparison. "We actually think we're going to be larger than Checkpoint," he says.

"He can't let this go without some qualification, however. 'Nothing is a given,' he adds quickly. "We can still fall on our face. But we're optimists."

So what does BackWeb Do?

BackWeb's product is a software platform that enables companies to build their own broadcast channels and download information directly to a user's desktop during idle on-line time. The system cuts out the Web's lengthy waiting times and also allows the user to continue working without interference since it works in the background and does not affect performance.

Rather than charging end users or using advertisements to make money, BackWeb sells its technology directly to companies or corporations that want to build their own channels.

One of the strengths of the product is that it can send not only written or graphic information, but also software and data. Network Associates, the world's leading anti-virus software company which supports more than three million users, has a BackWeb channel to send out anti-virus software automatically.

Compaq has preinstalled a BackWeb channel on a line of portable computers so that it can automatically send upgrades before problems arise. The company believes this will lower the amount of text-support calls it receives.

Other customers include Lanacom, HP, 3Com, Cisco and Intel.

A Formula for publicity?

A controversial 'sell' recommendation for Israel's leading software house has created a media stir in which critics are calling into question the motives of two audacious analysts

MARKET WATCH

Being an analyst seems to be the perfect job for a Jewish man or woman: You get paid for telling other people what you think.

In fact, the salary is good, and if you happen to be right, you'll get complimented as well. And if you suspect that you are on the wrong track you can always look for a reasonable excuse and rush to downgrade your estimates. If God forbid you're wrong, the company can always be blamed for supplying misleading information.

Last week when two Israelis found their names splashed across the front pages of the business supplements of all the Hebrew dailies, it became clear that being an analyst can also bring overnight fame. It all started when Doron Tsur and Avner Ben-Yeshaya at Sahar Securities decided to issue a controversial "sell" recommendation to Formula Systems, a favorite stock among investors, saying that shares of the software house are traded at a price which is some 20 percent higher than their real value.

Rarely does an analyst decide to issue a "sell" recommendation and even less frequently does he initiate new coverage with such a recommendation.

The negative assessment of Formula was even more surprising considering that Israel's largest software house has always enjoyed favorable coverage from foreign and local investment institutions. The company, which employs 1,200 workers and had last year a net income of NIS 68 million on sales NIS 540m., is currently covered by analysts from 11 investment houses. Besides Ofek Securities, Zannex Securities and Solid Capital Markets, all Israeli, the list includes such as BancAmerica, Morgan Stanley, Merrill Lynch, Robertson Stephens, Robert Fleming, Goldman Sachs, Robert Fleming, CIBC Oppenheimer, Natwest CIBC Oppenheimer, Barclays Capital Securities and Barclays Capital Group. All but Sahar are highly recom-ommending Formula's share.

The consensus among these analysts can partly explain the meteoric rise of Formula's shares, which have surged some 300 percent on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange since the beginning of 1997. The sharp rise and the company's strategy of acquiring other software companies and issuing a large number of subsidiaries abroad established Formula's position as the local version of Microsoft.

Tsur and Ben-Yeshaya were well aware their report would contradict the opinions of the entire group of analysts covering local stocks. Apparently, the two decided that confronting the views of the entire analyst community was not enough; they also questioned the sanity of Wall Street, where Formula's ADRs are traded.

The report opens with the words "It's not every day that the research department of a brokerage firm in Tel Aviv disputes the price levels of Wall Street - the largest and most efficient market in the world. Nevertheless, we still maintain that at any given moment, share prices should reflect the present value of a company's profits and its cash flows. Consequently, determining that a company trading at a future P/E ratio of 35 and 7 times annual sales is 'inexpensive' only because similar companies are trading at P/E ratios of 50 and at 10 times their annual turnovers, is unacceptable to us. At best, we can define it as being less expensive than others, which are traded at very high prices."

THE unique "sell" recommendation caught investors and traders by surprise, and Formula's stock dropped 3.3% on the following day. Dany Goldstein, Formula's chairman and main stock holder, rushed to defend his company.

In an interview published on the same day in the financial daily Globe, Goldstein accused Tsur and Ben-Yeshaya of using his company's name to garner media attention. While admitting that the two have done a professional job, Goldstein claimed they reached the wrong conclusion. "I think that the game was fixed," he said. "They were looking for a gimmick. They shot an arrow, and drew the target around it afterwards. It's a little bit odd to say that there are American idiots who don't understand a thing about real prices, while there is an Israeli who knows how to price software companies."

Goldstein was not the only one to reject Sahar's conclusion. The following day, Ofek Securities hurried to renew its "strong buy" recommendation for the share. The analysis referred directly to the various points presented in Sahar's work and explained why the conclusion should have been exactly the opposite.

It took only one more day for BancAmerica Robertson Stephens expert Victor Halpert, a veteran foreign analyst who covers Israeli stocks, to pick up the gauntlet. Halpert, who worked until recently for Salomon Smith Barney, announced that he maintains his "buy" recommendation for the company, and set a target price which is some 50% higher than Formula's market price.

The struggle between analysts did not fail to catch the media's eye, which gave the whole affair extensive coverage. Tsur, who heads the research department at Sahar, admits that when he published the analysis he expected a strong reaction, but even he was surprised by its extent.

"I could not predict such turmoil. They turned it into an issue," he said. "I gave my opinion and others can give theirs. The reaction was simply exaggerated."

Tsur, who is considered to be one of the leading local analysts, said that he is not angry at Goldstein's reaction. "Formula is working hard to maintain its relations with investors and analysts," Tsur said. "I can praise Goldstein for the fact that he took us seriously and said that we studied the material."

Tsur added that his lack of experience covering software companies did not hurt the report. He said he spent more than two months working on it and feels comfortable with the outcome.

Asked if he thinks he is at a disadvantage when competing with foreign analysts who know the field better, Tsur said he believes that as an Israeli he has a unique advantage. "Every Israeli in their early thirties with an academic degree has friends and relatives in the software industry who can provide information and give a different insight. And when you say software in Israel you say Formula."

Tsur also refutes accusations that he wrote the report to gain publicity and says he had no idea what his conclusion would be when he started working. "I was not interested in starting a fury. But I don't think that the fear of noise and discomfort should prevent me from stating my opinion to clients."

Only time will tell who was right in this case, but the whole affair has definitely created confusion for investors. After all, they are the ones who stand to gain or lose from Formula's performance.

Local stocks closed mixed yesterday, ahead of the interest rate announcement, with a decline in Koor Industries, one of the nation's largest holding companies, offset by a gain in Makhsheshim-Agan, a chemical producer, on expectations its earnings will rise 20 percent this year.

Koor, Israel's largest exporter of chemicals and telecommunications equipment, fell 3.18 percent to NIS 426, pushing the Maof Index of 25 largest companies down 1.13 points, or 0.33 percent, to 336.19.

Makhsheshim-Agan rose 1.53 percent to NIS 11.25, extending a three-day gain on expectations earnings will rise to NIS 0.83 per share, from NIS 0.69 in 1997.

Analysts said the company, which focuses on generic chemical products, won't be affected by the slump in the US chemical industry. "They'll do well this year and the key growth will come from their Latin American subsidiaries," said Avrom Gilbert, an analyst at Robert Fleming. "We have reiterated our 'buy' recommendation."

Shares in Makhsheshim-Agan have fallen 5 percent in the past four weeks on concern earnings will drop after DuPont, the US chemical giant, warned its profit won't meet expectations.

Makhsheshim-Agan derives as much as 15 percent of its revenue from the US.

Bezeq, Israel's state-run telephone company, closed at NIS 12.34, down 0.16 percent from yesterday's close, after Merrill Lynch & Co. said it sold a 4.15 percent stake for $102.5 million to a buyer it didn't identify. Gilbert said the move was expected.

The government, which owns about 54 percent of Bezeq, is considering a plan to sell additional shares in the company in the US at the beginning of 1999. The sale could raise $500 million, Bezeq chairman Izzy Tapuchi said last month.

Europe

UK stocks fell for a fifth consecutive day led by drugmaker Glaxo Wellcome Plc on concern results Thursday won't meet expectations. British Telecommunications Plc gained on hopes for its proposed venture with AT&T Corp.

The FTSE 100 index fell 56.2 points to 5836.1, posting its biggest five-day decline in nine months. Glaxo fell 81 pence to 1,700p, while BT bucked the trend rising 43p to 868p.

Glaxo, the world's second-biggest drugmaker, is expected to post a 25 percent drop in first-half net income Thursday as it adjusts to last year's patent expirations for what were then its two biggest-selling drugs, Zantac for ulcers and Zovirax for herpes.

"The market's not seen a lot of earnings per share growth from this company," said Nigel Thomas, the director of ABN Amro Asset Management's 40 million-pound ($66 million) UK Growth Fund, who owns Glaxo although he isn't considering selling at the moment.

Net income could fall to 788 million pounds ($1.31 billion), or 22.06 pence a share, from 1,045 billion pounds, or 29.4 pence a share, a year ago, according to a poll of five analysts. The range was 762 million to 800 million pounds.

Thomas said he's heavily weighted in telecoms and pharmaceuticals and has turned some holdings into cash where the markets are soft.

Among other possibilities, neither LDP Secretary General Koichi Kato nor former chief cabinet secretary Seiroku Kajiyama, who ran against Obuchi in Friday's LDP election, want the job. Japanese media reported.

"The finance minister's post is being pushed around like a hot potato," said Steve Barrow, a currency strategist at Bear Stearns International, who expects the dollar to rise to 145 yen this week. "It seems difficult to find someone willing."

Concern the new government won't do enough to revive the economy drove Japan's benchmark Nikkei 225 stock index down 2.5% to a nine-day low of 15,944.36. Falling stocks also hurt the yen, since international investors selling Japanese shares typically sell the yen proceeds.

"The fall in the Nikkei provides a sanitary reminder of the need for decisive and rapid action," said Michael Burke, a director at Burke and MacKinnon Ltd., a hedge fund advisory firm in London.

Japan's economy slipped into recession, contracting 0.7% in the year ended March 31. The Bank of Japan has held its benchmark discount rate at a record-low 0.5% since September 1995, and is likely to keep it there when its policy makers meet today. With rates at that level, investors said US-denominated assets will continue to be more attractive. (Bloomberg)

Japanese benchmark stock index fell to a one-month low on expectations Japan's next premier and his likely appointee for finance minister won't be able to rouse the nation from its economic slump.

Banks such as Sumitomo Bank Ltd. and top exporters including Sony Corp. paced the decline. Keizo Obuchi, the new Liberal Democratic Party president, and shoo-in for the new premier, will probably tap former Prime Minister Kiichi Miyazawa for the key finance minister's position.

"Miyazawa is a credible part of the problem to be a credible part of the solution," said Fitch IBCA, a director of research at WestLB Securities Pacific Ltd. "A Miyazawa appointment will lead to a weak currency and a declining market."

The benchmark Nikkei 225 stock index fell 417.53 points, or 2.55 percent, to 15,944.36. That's its lowest since June 30 and the biggest one-day drop since April 16. The benchmark has fallen four of the last five days as Obuchi came to the fore as Japan's new leader. The broader Topix index of all companies listed on the first section of the Tokyo Stock Exchange slid 24.03 points, or 1.91 percent, to 1233.98. (Bloomberg)

Three fans killed in auto race crash

BROOKLYN, Mich. (AP) - A crash at the US 500 auto race hurled a tire and other car parts into the grandstand, killing three spectators and injuring six others.

It was the first time in more than a decade that spectators were killed in an accident in a major auto race.

Dr. Gregory Baumann, the chief medical director at Michigan Speedway, said two people died instantly Sunday from the impact of the debris. A third person later died at one of the track's medical units.

Six spectators were taken by helicopter to Foote Hospital in Jackson, where they were listed in stable condition with injuries ranging from a fractured leg to neck and back injuries, hospital officials said.

A car driven by Adrian Fernandez of Mexico, the pole winner for the Championship Auto Racing Teams race, slid into the wall on lap 175 of the 250-lap race.

His right front tire and pieces of the suspension broke off, flying into the crowd in the fourth-turn grandstand. Fernandez, who was in third place at the time of the crash, suffered bruised knees.

As he heard the noise of the crash below, Gerald Brammer stood up to see what was happening.

"The next thing I know, a tire was flying in the air right at us," said Brammer, who attended the race with his brother Rich.

Brammer said he threw up his arm to block the tire as it brushed by him. It hit his brother in the back, but neither was injured seriously.

Becky Lutgen was at the track with her boyfriend watching Fernandez's car as it rounded the bend. She said they didn't see the tire from his car until it hit the stands and then landed about four or five rows behind them.

"It ricocheted in the stands and came to rest between some rows. It went by so fast," Lutgen said.

The deaths were the first among spectators at the track since 1969, when one fan was killed during a Trans-Am race on the road course.

At the 1987 Indianapolis 500, a tire bounded off the track, landing in the top row of the grandstand and killing a fan.

There have been other spectator deaths since at drag races and other auto events.

Sainz wins

Rally of New Zealand

Spanish driver Carlos Sainz won the Rally of New Zealand yesterday for the fourth time to regain the lead in the world rally championship.

Sainz recorded his 22nd championship victory, a record, in edging his Toyota teammate Didier Auriol of France by 4.1 seconds. Sainz clocked 3 hours, 54 minutes, 57.1 seconds.

Reigning champion Tommy Makinen of Finland finished third, fellow Finn Juha Kankkunen fourth and Colin McRae of Scotland fifth.

Sainz has 41 drivers' championship points, McRae has 38 and Makinen is in third place on 28 points.

Track and field stars Barnes, Mitchell suspended for drugs

NEW YORK (AP) - Two of the biggest names in US track and field - shot putter Randy Barnes and sprinter Dennis Mitchell - have been suspended indefinitely for drug use.

Barnes, the 1996 Olympic gold medalist and the world indoor and outdoor record-holder, and Mitchell, the 1992 Olympic bronze medalist in the 100 meters, were cited yesterday by the sport's world governing body for failing drug tests April 1.

Barnes, who could face a life suspension, was tested in Charleston, West Virginia, and Mitchell in Gainesville, Florida. Mitchell is president of USA

Track and Field's Athletes Advisory Committee, the athletes' voice in the national governing body, which has taken a hard stance against drugs.

His suspension was handed down last week and represents his first drug offense.

The International Amateur Athletic Federation did not officially announce the suspensions, and the precise terms of the punishment have yet to be determined.

These are two of the most prominent suspensions in track and field, following Ben Johnson at the 1988 Olympics, Butch Reynolds in 1990 and Mary Slaney in 1997. Johnson is banned for life. Reynolds served his suspension and is now competing. Slaney was cleared and is also running again.

IAAF spokesman Giorgio Renieri said yesterday from Monaco that Barnes and Mitchell tested positive during out-of-competition samples.

So far, only the A samples have been tested, Renieri said.

However, that is sufficient for the IAAF to levy a suspension.

If their B samples are positive, the IAAF will then rule on the severity of the punishment pending a hearing by USATF. If the B sample is negative, they are cleared.

Samaranch calls for world conference on drugs

LAUSANNE (AP) - As president Juan Antonio Samaranch came under fire for reportedly suggesting that some performance-enhancing drugs should be legal, the IOC said yesterday it will convene a special conference on doping in January.

In the wake of Samaranch's controversial remarks in a Spanish newspaper, the International Olympic Committee said it would organize a meeting in Lausanne to review the fight against doping in sport.

The statement said Samaranch expects the conference to produce "a clear definition of doping."

The initiative comes amid the doping scandal which has tarnished the Tour de France cycling race, with riders and team officials implicated in widespread use of EPO and other illegal drugs.

Samaranch was quoted in the Spanish paper El Mundo on Sunday as saying the list of banned substances should be "drastically" reduced and that drugs which don't damage an athlete's health should not be prohibited.

"Doping now is everything that, firstly, is harmful to an athlete's health and, secondly, artificially augments his performance," he was quoted as saying. "If it's just the second case, for me that's not doping. If it's the first case, it is."

Steroids and EPO, a synthetic hormone which boosts endurance by stimulating the production of red blood cells, are known to pose serious health hazards.

Betar edge Faroe Islands 1-0

By ORI LEWIS

Betar Jerusalem secured their place in the next round of the Champions League qualifiers with a 1-0 away soccer victory against B.36 Torshavn of the Faroe Islands last night.

The lone goal, by Istvan Hamar in the 68th minute was enough to see the Betar, 5-1 aggregate winners, through to their next home-and-away series against Lisbon's Benfica.

Only a few hundred fans turned out for the match which was played on the natural grass surface in Tofir, about an hour's drive from the Torshavn, the capital.

The win will be a morale-booster for the Jerusalemites, who next face the Portuguese side for a place in the prestigious and lucrative Champions League and a chance at making some big bucks.

That clash, also over two legs is set for next month. Benfica are due to host Betar in their 120,000 stadium in the Portuguese capital on August 12 with the return leg two weeks later.

Previous Israeli sides have not managed to win in the bleak, windswept Faroe Islands, population 45,000, which lie halfway between the Shetland Islands and Iceland. Maccabi Haifa were beaten 3-2 by Klaksvikar Trottafarlag in the Cup Winners Cup in 1995 while the national team drew 1-1 in a friendly international in 1992.

Stewart, Atherton seal win for England

South Africa lose by 8 wickets; Stewart takes 1st win as captain

NOTTINGHAM (AP) — Alec Stewart played a no-nonsense innings yesterday to put an eight-wicket victory in the fourth cricket Test against South Africa beyond doubt and claim his first Test win as England captain.

In the process, Stewart — who hit an unbeaten 45 off 34 balls — denied former skipper Mike Atherton of a well-deserved century but Atherton managed to hit the winning runs and was not out 98 when England posted victory at Trent Bridge.

England started the day needing 139 runs to win and with nine wickets in hand. The home side still needed 55 runs when Nassar Hussain was out for 58, shortly after lunch when Atherton was on 87.

Stewart strode to the crease determined not to let South Africa make any further breakthroughs. He belted Allan Donald for three boundaries in one over to signal his intention of sealing a win as quickly as possible.

After being outclassed and outplayed by the South Africans in the second and third Tests, England won by eight wickets and now has a chance to win the series with one Test remaining at Headingley next week.

Atherton and Stewart, England's two form batsmen throughout the series, ensured England a morale-boosting victory after fast bowler Angus Fraser laid the groundwork with a 10-wicket match haul.

In a Test marred by several umpiring controversies, mostly against the South Africans, England's remarkable fight back after conceding a 38-run first innings lead has been completely overshadowed.

Atherton, playing his 50th home Test, weathered a furious stint of bowling from Allan Donald on Sunday after New Zealand umpire Steve Dunn turned down a confident appeal from South Africa for a caught behind.

But Donald failed to intimidate Atherton, who returned to the wicket yesterday in a confident frame of mind.

Atherton and Hussain (58) put on a match-winning 152 runs in four hours before Donald finally separated the pair, when Jacques Kallis took a spectacular catch to dismiss Hussain.

The second wicket pair brought up the 100-run stand in 164 minutes as the first hour of play realized 38 runs in 15 overs.

South African captain Hansie Cronje switched his bowlers around in desperate search of a breakthrough but a breakthrough was not forthcoming in the first session.

Only once before had England scored more than 240 runs to win a Test at home and that was in 1902, when it scored 262 in the final innings to beat Australia by one wicket at the Oval.

Earlier it was Angus Fraser's bowling which led a remarkable England fight back, the fast bowler taking his second five-wicket haul for the match.

Fraser followed up his 5-60 in the first innings with 5-60 for a 10-wicket haul, his second this year since his 11-110 against the West Indies at Port-of-Spain in February.

Fraser was an uncertain starter for the match when he was bracketed with Allan Mullally for one bowling spot, but he is virtually certain to start the next Test after two heroic performances — the first with the bat to save off South African victory at Old Trafford, the second at Trent Bridge with the ball.

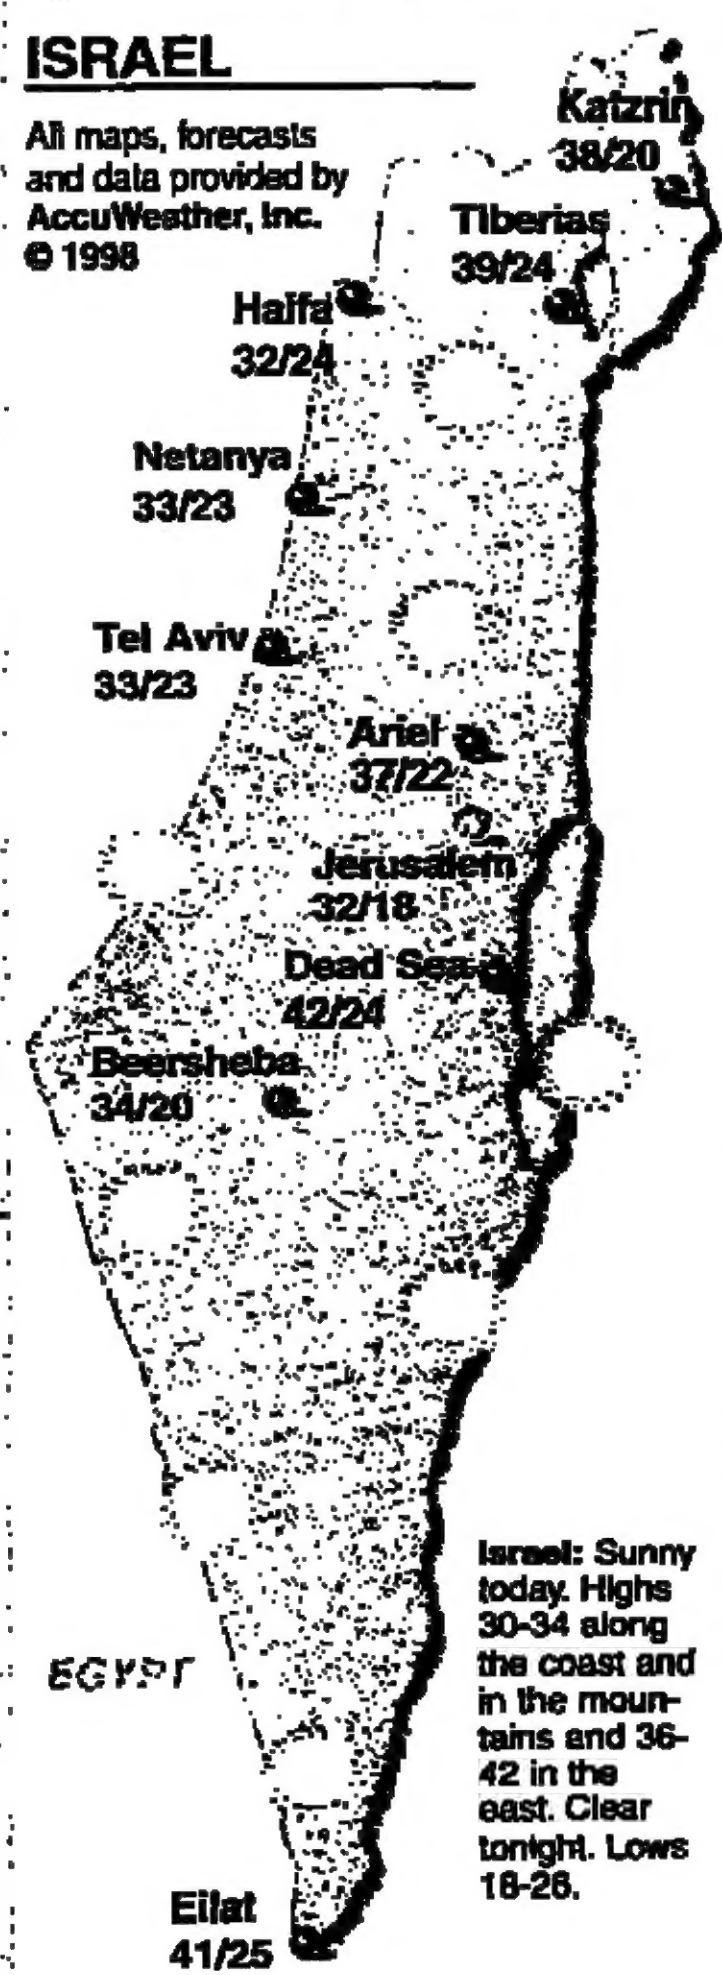

Apart from a handful of decisions that had gone against the South Africans, soft dismissals in the second innings contributed to a paltry 208 which set a gettable target for the English.

Pantani takes Tour lead in Alps

LES DEUX ALPES (AP) — Marco Pantani of Italy took over the lead in the Tour de France yesterday by moving away in the final two climbs and opening a gap over defending champion Jan Ullrich.

Pantani was in fourth place entering the day, 3 minutes, 1 second behind Ullrich. After the finish, at the end of the day he had a lead of 3 minutes, 53 seconds over American Bobby Julich.

Ullrich, weakening in the final climb, ended up almost nine minutes behind on the day and dropped down to fourth overall.

The 15th stage is from Grenoble to Les Deux Alpes, 189 kilometers with four major climbs including two rated "out of category" on a scale of steepness, height and length.

The hills were made worse with rain and fog throughout the day. Temperatures dipped below 10°C (50°F) after Sunday's stage was more than 30°C (86°F).

It was mostly a waiting game throughout the day until the final two climbs. Although France's Christophe Rinero and others built a lead coming over the first two peaks, the group of favorites were watching each other.

Then Pantani went into action. Heading up the 2,645-meter Galibier mountain, Pantani made his move.

He quickly left the other favorites and took off after the Rinero group.

He built up a lead of almost three minutes at the top of the mountain and even had time to stop completely and put on a plastic jacket to protect him from the wind and cold on the descent.

Although Ullrich cut the gap slightly on the downhill, Pantani moved away on the final climb to the ski station of Les Deux Alpes, almost 1,650 meters with rain worsening.

There are two more days in the Alps with an important time trial coming up on Saturday.

Brown: Drugs rife in distance running

LONDON (AP) — Leading British distance runner Jon Brown says use of the banned drug EPO is as "rife" in his sport as it is in cycling.

The 1996 European cross country champion said EPO was endemic among European runners competing in distances from 5,000 meters to the marathon. However, he said he didn't "suspect" athletes from east Africa who have lowered distant records in recent years.

"Two years ago (the use of EPO) was virtually non-existent in distance running, but I think now you have got some main players operating on the stuff," Brown was quoted as saying in the Times newspaper yesterday.

Brown made the allegations amid the drug scandal which has marred the Tour de France.

forcing the achievements of cyclists to take a backseat to the alleged widespread use of EPO in the sport.

EPO is a performance-enhancing substance which increases the oxygen-carrying capacity of the blood by increasing the level of red blood cells. It is most beneficial to endurance athletes.

"It is mainly the European athletes from countries with a background in cycling. The same people are supplying the cyclists and the distance runners," Brown told the Independent newspaper.

"Once you go down that road — the same as cycling — sport is not real sport and the barriers are unlimited," he said.

"It's going to be like the Tour (Tour de France), where people think if you don't take the stuff, you're not going to come first. In cycling it is team policy. I would not like to see distance running go that way."

After gaining British selection for the European championships starting in Budapest next month, the 27-year-old athlete said his main goal was to beat the cheats.

"Soon there is going to be no way anybody is going to beat these characters without playing their game."

Minus NBA stars, world c'ships are wide open

ATHENS (AP) — This was supposed to be a wide-open World Basketball Championship.

Grant Hill, Gary Payton, Tim Duncan and other NBA stars were going to lead the latest USA Dream Team to another gold medal.

But the NBA's labor dispute scrapped all that, and nearly half of the 16 teams in the championship, which opens tomorrow and ends August 9, harbor realistic hopes of a medal, maybe gold.

Rudy Tomjanovich's US team is an anonymous, workmanlike group that will need discipline and defense to earn the title that would have been a sure thing for a crew of NBA stars.

Asked for a comparison with the All-Everything squad he was originally slated to coach, Tomjanovich said, "It's not close as far as the talent. We have to do it with teamwork and let the system create opportunities."

USA Basketball initially selected 12 NBA players for the world championship, but with a lock-out looming July 1, the All-Stars threatened a boycott. USA Basketball moved first, announcing June 16 it was dropping the latest incarnation of the Dream Team.

The result is a curious mix of five CBA players, five Americans playing abroad, one collegian (Duke's Trajan Langdon) and one player looking for a job.

"We have a lot of players who have played overseas and they have been helping us with scouting reports," said starting point guard Michael Hawkins, whose own resume reads like a road map.

The 6-foot guard has played for the NBA's Boston Celtics, the CBA's Rockford Lightning and Olympiakos of the Greek League — all in the past two years.

Like his teammates for the next two weeks, Hawkins doesn't have to worry about what sponsorship deals he might be violating during an eventual medal ceremony.

At the 1992 Olympics, when the Dream Team debuted and hammered Croatia for the gold, Magic Johnson, Michael Jordan and Charles Barkley took to the medal stand with American flags draped over their shoulders — not an act of unbridled patriotism, but an effort to hide the Reebok logos on the team warmup suits because of conflicting commercial endorsements.

Tomjanovich, who has guided his Houston Rockets to two NBA titles, uses words like "hustle" and "unselfish" a lot when discussing his charges.

For the most part the other 15 countries in the field will not be represented by NBA talent either, though as among the Americans, there are castoffs.

Australia, bringing the same squad that reached the Goodwill Games final, does have Dallas Mavericks center Chris Anstey, but that's about it.

Yugoslavia, Russia and Lithuania will challenge even though it appears none will have their NBA players. Italy gets instant offense from guard Carlton Myers, who scored 29 points in an 80-75 exhibition loss to Team USA in Rome Saturday night.

New Jersey Nets bust Yinka Dare will play for Nigeria, which also has big bodies in Obinna Ekezie of the University of Maryland, and Markin Ndaye, who played at North Carolina.

Greece could contend if it gets a lift from home-court advantage. But organizers had counted on a Dream Team to help sell tickets, and some local basketball fans may be heading off for island vacations instead.

"I feel the championship won't be that interesting," said Costas Galerides, a highway engineer from Athens. "Of course, if the NBA guys were here, nobody else would have a chance."
